ary coin, and shall not be counted as part of the two millions per month coined under the Bland Act. This feature of the bill is virtually a new Bland Act, with the difference that it requires the bullion to be bought at 23 per cent. above its market value, and that it is limited in its operation to the amount of trade dollars that can be scraped together within six months. Every argument based upon the principles of sound finance which the President so happily expressed in his letter of February, 1885, to Gen. Warner, and which Secretary Manning has so often repeated, applies to this bill. If it would be a violation of those principles to pass a bill increasing the coinage under the Bland Act, which provides for the purchase of silver at its market value, it is a more flagrant violation of the same principles to pass a bill with that end in view which provides for the purchase of bullion at a premium of 23 per cent. It may be said that the Treasury is not required to coin this bullion into standard silver dollars, but may convert it into subsidiary coin. The answer to this is, that the Treasury already has a surplus of some thirty millions of subsidiary coin which it is carrying as dead capital. To add twenty millions more, or any other sum, would be as wasteful as to spend that sum in building old line-of-battle ships for the navy.

District-Attorney Martine, in giving his opinion to the State Senate touching the authority of Pinkerton's Men to carry arms, made the following extraordinary statement respecting the recent labor troubles: "A numerous class of our people are now engaged in the movement to better their condition. It does not appear that they have gone beyond lawful efforts. If they do, the police and military are sufficient to restrain them, and they should not be placed at mercy of the armed men in private employ." Now, if Mr. Martine knows enough about the matter to say anything whatever about it, he knows that every large strike of the past year has been accompanied with atrocious violence, that in every one of them the strikers have attempted by force of arms to prevent peaceable men from taking their places, and to damage the property of their late employers. He knows that in not one spot in the Union where these troubles have occurred, have the police and military been sufficient to restrain them except in this city, the police force of which is extraordinarily good. But can we blame the laborers, when their passions are inflamed and their delusions fostered and their lawlessness stimulated by such perversions as this, coming from the sworn minister of the law? Pinkerton's Men are a national disgrace, but the disgrace comes through the misconduct of mayors, sheriffs, district attorneys, and governors who fail or refuse to do their duty in protecting life and property. Until they are taught to behave themselves properly in word and deed, people will not surrender their arms so as to enable the Quinns and "Putnams" to have their way.

There is a programme for military and naval expenditures at Washington which foots up $98,000,000. The first measure in this attractive catalogue is the Hawley bill, providing for coast defences. The second is the Cameron bill for cruisers. The third is the Hale bill for ironclads. All these measures have passed the Senate. The fourth is the Stanford bill, the fifth the Dolph bill or amendment. The complete list was published in the Philadelphia Press the other day, with some valuable comments from its Washington correspondent, on the "defence craze" which is running away with the Treasury surplus. It is to be said, however, that the $98,000,000, if appropriated, is to be spent in yearly instalments of about $20,000,000 per year, and not all at once. The fate of these bills in the House is extremely doubtful. Mr. Randall is determined to defeat the Hawley $20,000,000 bill if he can, and the probability is that he will succeed. He entertains the belief that there is an immense job concealed in that measure, while others believe that there is a smaller but equally pernicious one lurking in his own $10,000,000 bill. Charges and counter-charges are hurled back and forth with great freedom, but nobody has ventured to impeach the personal motives of either Gen. Hawley or Mr. Randall. It is quite certain, however, that public confidence in the bona-fides of both measures has been impaired, and that the "defence craze" has somewhat abated in consequence.

The chief point in dispute between the advocates of the Hawley bill and those of the Randall measure relates to the mode of going to work, the former contending for Government gun factories and the latter for private establishments. Leaving out the element of jobbery as a matter altogether of surmise, and at the present stage unprovable, and looking at the results achieved abroad, there is much to be said in favor of private enterprise. The establishments of Krupp in Prussia and of Armstrong and Whitworth in England have been so remarkably successful that if any one of these existed in the United States, it would hardly be deemed necessary for the Government to build foundries of its own. But there being no such works here, it is a matter for fair debate whether the Government should take the rôle of a manufacturer, or should invite capitalists and inventors by offering to buy their products in certain quantities according to specifications fixed by the Ordnance Bureau. That the plant should be created in this country is an absolute necessity, if we are to have fortifications at all, but that fact does not estop us from buying guns for immediate use from Mr. Krupp or anybody else who may have the right thing for sale. We suppose that it would not be possible to create works equal to those at Essen in a shorter time than ten years with all the money in the Treasury, although very respectable guns might be produced within five or six years. The "friends of American industry," however, would be shocked at the thought of buying a gun or a ship of foreign make, even if an enemy were in full sail against our shores.

The House of Representatives some time since passed a bill to provide for an additional Judge of the United States Circuit Court for this district. The President had recommended such a measure in his annual message, and the bill passed without objection, except from some Western critics, who said that there were other districts which needed more judges too. However true this may be, it is certainly no argument against relieving the Southern District of New York at once. The bill, however, has gone to the Senate, and what has become of it there no one seems to know. In the Judiciary Committee the natural course would be to refer such a measure to Mr. Evarts, who would no doubt be glad to have it put in his power to do something to promote the more efficient administration of justice in his own State; but if it has been referred to him, what has he done with it? There is no dispute about the necessity of an additional Federal judge. This is the great centre of the judicial business of the whole country, and the judges cannot possibly get through with their work. A year ago, as appeared from an official statement furnished to the House by Secretary Manning, there were pending here 2,201 separate revenue cases, going back as far as 1867, and involving $11,519,268. Every one knows that a great number of revenue cases are decided against the Government, and it has been estimated that the interest account running on the claims which will probably be decided in favor of the plaintiffs is $150,000 a year. In other words, we waste every year an amount sufficient to pay the salaries of twenty-five judges at their present rate of compensation, without getting the work done. Under these circumstances, there should be no doubt about the passing of this bill at the present session. Indeed, if reported back from the Committee, it is certain to be passed. If it is really in Mr. Evarts's hands, he knows all about the condition of business in the Federal courts, and therefore argument would be thrown away upon him. If it has not been referred to him, we trust that he will make a search for it at once, in order that it may be passed before the session ends.

The report of the State Charities Aid Association on the Postal Savings Bank Bill now pending in Congress indicates that no action can be expected upon it during the present session. The gratifying statement is made that a majority of the members of the Post office Committee of the House were favorable to the bill. The rapid extinction of the public debt has lessened the means for investing the deposits which might be expected if the bill should become a law, but its usefulness as a place of safe keeping of the funds of the poorer classes, in districts not provided with savings banks, is in no wise diminished. Any man who has a thousand dollars in gold or silver coin can take it to the Treasury and get certificates of deposit for it, and the coin will be returned to him on the demand of himself or the holder of the certificates. Why should not the man who has one dollar or less have the like privilege? It is said that the result would be a locking up of money in the Treasury. This apprehension is much exaggerated, but in the worst aspect of the case it may properly be asked, Whose money is it that is to be locked up? If every would-be savings depositor had a perfectly secure chimney crevice, or inaccessible coffee-pot or hole in the ground, where he could put his money with absolute assurance of finding it again, who would have the right to object to his putting his money there? Who objects to the withdrawal of gold and silver coin from circulation for conversion into jewelry, plate, watch cases, tooth fillings, gilding, chemicals, etc.? It is only necessary to state this objection in order to show its absurdity. Well-founded objections exist to the collection of money by taxation to be locked up in the Treasury. But the taking of money from the people by force in order to lock it up is widely different from leaving them free to lock it up if they want to, either in their pockets, or in old stockings, or in safe-deposit vaults, or in the public Treasury. The amount of money that will be left unused at any time, if any profitable use can be made of it, is too small to constitute a valid objection to the Postal Savings Bill.

All reports from Albany indicate a depressed feeling among the advocates of needed reform measures. The promoters of the Constitutional Convention bills say they have small hopes of any action, simply because the petty partisanship of both parties is so rampant that an impartial and wise plan for a convention finds few supporters. It is even said that the Field Code has a better chance this year than it has ever had before, simply because the tendency is to favor everything that is bad. Gen. Husted, we are told, is going about saying: "We shall pass the code this year. The American Bar Association has approved it, you know, and that will have great weight." Of course the American Bar Association has not approved it, and Gen. Husted is unusually ignorant if he does not know it. The Association distinctly refused to approve it. What it did was to say that a well-made code would be a good thing to have, which is a vastly different thing from approving the Field Code. We are not prepared to believe that the Legislature is going to pass Mr. Field's absurd measure, but what a commentary we are given once more upon the character of our legislators: they are openly opposed to the most necessary and desirable measures, and with great difficulty restrained from passing the worst.

The trick by which Speaker Husted pushed the Woman Suffrage Bill to a third reading on Friday was in all respects worthy of that statesman's recent career. In passing judgment on this performance, it does not make any difference whether the bill is a good or a bad one. It is, at any rate, a bill needing debate, which many members wished to debate, and the consequences of which, whether good or bad, are sure to be very serious. No human being can tell, for instance, what its effect will be on the government of this city. It will probably strengthen the hands of the enemies of the liquor interest; but what effect will it have on the enforcement of the law against the violence and disorders of "labor," on the school question, on taxation, and on the quality of elected officials? Nobody knows, and the Albany legislators do not care.

The speeches and resolutions of the liquor-dealers' mass-meeting in Steinway Hall on Wednesday week would make a first-rate campaign document in favor of the High-License Bill. When the men who control the 8,000 or more out-and-out liquor saloons in this city meet and declare "that, in the interest of public morality, we protest against the High-License Bill, and call the attention of the Legislature to the centralization and undemocratic tendencies of the measure," they furnish the best possible evidence that the bill is in the interest of public morals and good government. What the liquor-dealers do not want is precisely the measure which the good of society demands. A great deal of energy was expended in predicting that a $1,000 license on liquors would lead to illicit and secret selling so long as the price of a beer license was only $100. If this should prove to be the case, a remedy could easily be found by raising the rate for all licenses to $1,000. The reform that is sought now is the reduction in the number of saloons which sell alcoholic liquors. There are 7,773 of these which are licensed, against only 811 licensed beer saloons. The liquor-dealers show by their loud protests that they are afraid of the $1,000 license plan, and are by no means so confident of the easy violation of such a law as they pretend. If they were confident that by taking a $100 license they could go on selling all kinds of liquors with small chance of detection, why this uproar? Do they expect the public to believe that the average liquor-dealer is such a high-minded, public-spirited citizen that he would not avail himself of this chance to cheat the city out of $900 a year?

The last report of the Registrar-General in England appears to overthrow the long-accepted theory that the marriage rate varies inversely with the price of food. For a number of years the price of food, and indeed of almost every article which wages buy, has been falling, while wages, if not maintained at the old level, have not fallen proportionately. In other words, these years have been years of more than usual prosperity for the working classes, and, according to the old theory, they should have been also years in which marriages were more than usually numerous. Instead of this, however, the marriage rate has fallen from something more than 17 to every 1,000 of the population in 1873, to something more than 14 to every 1,000 in 1885. The only explanation possible appears to be that the masses are learning the lesson of greater forethought in contracting marriage as they become better off. The difference in this respect between them and the well-to-do classes is still great, as is shown by the fact that the miners and those employed in textile factories, who have no private means and but a precarious prospect of employment, marry at twenty-three, while the professional class, who very commonly have some private means, and certainly some prospect of making an income, do not marry till thirty. But the steady diminution of the marriage rate in the whole population would seem to prove that the poor are making some progress in prudence.

There is one exception to the rule as to the exercise of prudence in contracting marriage among the professional class. Barristers, and doctors, and merchants in England do not, as a rule, take wives until they have something on which to support a family, and the public opinion of the professional class discourages the marriage of a man who is without means or prospects. But this principle does not hold as to the clergy. It is still true, the Spectator says, that they marry early and recklessly, with the consequence that the Church is discredited by their poverty and by the appeals that are constantly being made to relieve it. The Spectator attributes this course of the clergy to a false public opinion among the laity, the sense of the evils of a celibate clergy being so strong that the most hopelessly imprudent marriage is somehow thought to be justified if the offender is a clergyman. The theory expressed in the saying that "a parson is not half a parson till he is married," thus leads public teachers to set the working classes an example of improvidence and imprudence. Dean Stanley is credited with having said that what was wanted in the Church of England was a close time for curates, and the Spectator thinks that "if public opinion steadily discouraged clerical marriage until a man had a living—unless, indeed, he had private means equivalent to a living—it would do a service to the working class as well as to the Church."

The advantages possessed by Bismarck in the German elections which took place on Monday can hardly be appreciated, except in Germany. The belief prevailed there that he held war and peace in his hands, and that if he carried the majority of the Reichstag, there would be no war, while, if his opponents were successful, he would adopt a course towards France which would result in war. Upon the occurrence of war, however occasioned, hundreds of thousands of young men in all the walks of life, high and low, rich and poor, must abandon their business, drop their tools, take their places in the ranks, and expose their lives and limbs to the enemy's cannon. For example, there is a bank in Berlin having some five hundred clerks. Upon the outbreak of a war, one hundred and eighty-eight of these young men must drop their pens, shoulder arms, and march to the frontier. Such a draft upon its working force immediately disorganizes the institution, and the same effect is produced in every large business establishment. The fears of the young men, their friends and relatives, and of the proprietors of large business concerns, constitute a political bias in favor of the Government, of enormous strength. To whatever extent it is believed that Bismarck can control the storm, is his influence on the minds of voters augmented. It is a grave peril that menaces Germany when she is asked to surrender constitutional government on pain of a desolating foreign war.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, February 16, to TUESDAY, February 22, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC

ON Wednesday, the 16th, the President vetoed the bill "to enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to make a special distribution of seeds in the drought-stricken counties of Texas," which provided for an appropriation of $10,000 for this purpose. "I can find no warrant for such an appropriation in the Constitution," the President wrote in his message, "and I do not believe that the power and duty of the General Government ought to be extended to the relief of individual suffering which is in no manner properly related to the public service or benefit. A prevalent tendency to disregard the limited mission of this power and duty should, I think, be steadfastly resisted, to the end that the lesson should be constantly enforced that, though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people."

The President, before he returned the Dependent Pension Bill to Congress, received a large number of letters requesting him to veto it; and after he vetoed it he received a large number of congratulatory letters, many of them from prominent veterans of the war.

By a ruling of the Speaker of the House of Representatives against a motion to permit the immediate consideration of the Blair Educational Bill, it has been made impossible for that measure to be considered in the House before the Forty-ninth Congress adjourns.

Both houses of Congress on Saturday passed the Trade-Dollar Bill. It provides that for six months these dollars shall be redeemed at their face value by the United States Treasurer or Assistant Treasurers, and be recoined into standard dollars; but "that the trade dollars recoined under this act shall not be counted as part of the silver bullion required to be purchased and coined into standard dollars as required by the act of February 28, 1878."

The Senate on Monday passed the House River and Harbor Bill with amendments, and the bill is now in the hands of a committee of conference. The House Committee on Military Affairs has reported a bill appropriating $5,000,000 for coast defences.

The Senate has adopted the conference report on the Anti-Polygamy Bill. The bill repeals the charter of the Mormon Church, and instructs the Attorney-General to institute proceedings to recover property not acquired by that corporation in accord with the laws of the United States. It has gone to the President. The prediction is made that, if it becomes a law, it will give the death-blow to polygamy and to the Mormon hierarchy.

The Senate has passed three bills for the better equipment of the navy and for coast defences. One appropriates $8,000,000 for the purchase of steel for ordnance and for armor, and for the erection of an army-gun factory at West Troy, N. Y., and $5,000,000 for the construction of fortifications, making a total of $13,000,000. The second bill (Mr. Cameron's) sets apart $15,000,000 for the construction of ten protected steel cruisers, $2,000,000 for the payment of bonuses for speed beyond the contract requirements, and $4,800,000 for the armament of the vessels, a total of $21,800,000. The last (Mr. Hale's bill) appropriates $15,000,000 for the construction of heavily-armored vessels, or armored floating batteries, or rams, to be used for coast and harbor defences, for torpedo boats and the like. The total appropriations which will be made if these four bills pass the House and are approved, will be more than $58,000,000.

The Tehuantepec Ship Railway Bill, so amended that the United States shall not guarantee the interest on a part of the share capital, passed the Senate on Thursday by a vote of forty-six to seven.

The House Committee on Invalid Pensions has made a unanimous report favoring the passage of the Dependent Pension Bill over the President's veto.

The members of the Congressional Conference Committee on the Inter-State Commerce Law are agreed that the law forbids the issue of a railroad pass to any person. It was at first thought that passes could lawfully be issued to preachers by the roads to which the law applies.

A petition has been presented to the Legislature of Texas protesting against the investigation by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections of the conduct of the election last fall in Washington County.

In the New Jersey Assembly the Democratic contestants for disputed seats have been seated, and many fruitless ballots have been taken in the effort to elect a United States Senator.

The long contest in the West Virginia Legislature to elect a United States Senator is not yet ended.

The Legislature of Nevada has passed, with only three opposing votes, a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment the adoption of which will disfranchise all members of the Mormon Church in that State.

The Judicial Committee in the Senate of Pennsylvania has reported favorably on a bill making two-thirds of the jury sufficient to acquit or convict in criminal cases.

A bill has been introduced in the Legislature of New York providing for the erection of a monument on the battle-field of Gettysburg to each of the regiments and batteries from the State which took place in that battle, the cost of each to be not more than $500.

The Brooklyn Civil-Service Reform Association held its annual meeting Thursday evening, when a statement was made by a special committee that a "serious irregularity" had been discovered in one of the examinations conducted by the municipal Civil-Service Commissioners. The report also showed that Mayor Whitney had created seventeen new positions exempted from examination, for some of which examination seemed to be practicable and desirable.

The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor have sent a petition to both branches of the Legislature and to the Governor, for the enactment of a high-license law, and vigorous efforts have been made by other organizations and by many prominent individuals to cause the passage of the bill that has been introduced.

Fully 4,000 men who engaged in the great strike in New York and the adjacent cities were left idle last week after the strike was declared ended, and many of them are not likely to find work for a month or more to come. No provision has been made for their support by District Assembly 49 of the Knights of Labor, and they must shift for themselves.

The strike of the street-car drivers in Boston and its suburbs continues. In Cambridge three cars were stoned on Sunday. The police discovered a large collection of bricks, paving-stones, and other missiles on the roof of a house on one route which were intended for violent use if the cars were run at night.

The full returns of the election of Mayor of Philadelphia on the 15th are: Fitler (Rep.) 90,497, Keim (Dem.) 62,204, Philips (Labor) 1,664.

The resignation of the Hon. E. R. Hoar as President of the Board of Overseers of Harvard University has been accepted, and a committee has been appointed to nominate his successor.

The Canada Pacific Railroad west of Winnipeg is blocked with snow, and trains may not be able to run regularly before May 1. A number of engines have been abandoned. Trains have been abandoned also in Dakota on account of the snow. On Thursday there was such a severe storm in Colorado that a number of trains were blown from the tracks. Parts of Chicago were inundated, and people were obliged to leave their houses. Ice gorges in Michigan have caused destructive overflows. The continued cold weather in many places in the far West has made a serious fuel famine.

One wire, extending in a circuitous route from Chicago by way of Deming, N. M., and Los Angeles to San Francisco, was the only medium of telegraphic communication on Friday night between the cities of the East and the entire country west of the Rocky Mountains. The series of storms between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains, lasting three weeks, has been without a precedent since the telegraph company's lines west of Chicago reached the dignity of a system.

The lowest estimate of the loss of cattle in Montana this season is 25 per cent., and many cattle men say that 40 to 50 per cent. have perished. One owner has lost 10,000 out of a herd of 25,000.

The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company has equipped two passenger trains between Chicago and Milwaukee with apparatus for heating by steam from locomotives. The experiment has so far proved successful, but it has not yet had the test of severe weather. The company is also building an iron heating car to carry a boiler for generating steam for heating the train and to run next the engine. This is the first experiment made on any long line of railroad to dispense with stoves in passenger cars. Bills have this week been introduced in several State Legislatures to prohibit the use of stoves.

Gen. Robert B. Potter died at his residence in Newport on February 19. Having made a brilliant military record during the war, at its close he was assigned to the military command of Rhode Island and Connecticut, with headquarters in Newport, where he was a great favorite in military and social circles.

FOREIGN.

The most important event on the Continent during the week was the German election on Monday. During the political campaign the excitement became every day more intense. The Emperor sent an autograph letter in support of the candidature of the Prince of Hohenzollern against a Triennate opponent. The North German Gazette, Prince Bismarck's organ, declared that the Reichstag would again be dissolved if the Government did not secure a majority at the elections. All the Government administrators of the districts promulgated formal instructions to their subordinates, in which they attacked the Liberals very freely. The Liberal leader, Richter, answered them in an open letter, to show the absurdity of their statement that those who voted against the Septennate were enemies of the Emperor and of the Empire. The authorities forcibly stopped a New Liberal meeting at Berlin on Sunday, just as Herr Richter was about to speak. The audience of several thousand persons afterward marched through the streets cheering for Richter, and many arrests were made.

The election on Monday resulted in the return of a majority for the Government. But in Alsace-Lorraine the Septennate candidates were defeated, and this is considered an ill-augury of peace, and as likely to lead to the adoption of severe measures in those provinces. Herr Windthorst was reëlected. The total Socialist vote shows an increase of 500,000. It is reported in official circles that the Emperor will summon the Reichstag to meet, without waiting for the supplementary elections to be held, as soon as verified returns show the election of a sufficient number of Deputies to constitute a quorum. The supplementary elections will be held on March 3.

On the Emperor of Germany's birthday, March 22, his youngest great-grandson will be christened, and the betrothal of Prince Henry of Prussia to Princess Irene of Hesse will be proclaimed.

Several workmen's unions and Socialist societies at Pesth started a fund to assist German candidates who opposed the Imperial Government in the recent election. When Premier Tisza heard of the movement he forbade it, saying that Hungary was too intimately connected with Germany to sanction such opposition to the German Government.

The Emperor of Austria has held two councils of war. Twenty thousand applications have been received for officers' commissions in the Hungarian Landsturm. Rich women are seeking positions in the ambulance service. The Budget Committee of the Reichsrath, by a unanimous vote, have agreed to the credit of 12,000,000 florins for the equipment of the Landwehr and the Landsturm.

The relations between Austria and Russia are reported to be so much improved that it is no longer expected that Austria would make a Russian occupation of Bulgaria a casus belli.

The Franco-German situation is again declared by all the Continental correspondents to be one of great tension. "I fear," says the Paris correspondent of the London Standard, "that the sanguine mood prevailing just now is destined to be somewhat roughly dispelled at a not very distant time, when the country will be brought face to face with very unpleasant realities on the Franco-German frontier. Generally great excitement is said to prevail, and preparations of all kinds are being advanced rapidly, the population being almost in a panic."

There was a riot at Saarburg, Lorraine, on the 18th. A crowd of youths paraded the streets singing the "Marseillaise," and a conflict arose, in which a police constable was killed. Many inhabitants of Alsace-Lorraine have applied to the Austrian Government for citizenship, in the hope to escape military duty in the event of war. The German authorities have arrested in Mühlhausen several persons suspected of being connected with the French Patriotic League. Work on the fortifications at Verdun has continued night and day. All commerce has been suspended at Metz, except in food. The inhabitants are storing their houses from cellar to garret.

Despatches from St. Petersburg say that in Russian Government circles the conviction is gaining ground that war between France and Germany is inevitable. As a fresh defeat of France might involve disastrous results to Russia, the Czar's Government will, it is said, in the event of war, preserve entire liberty of action. It will not support France as an ally, but may, by a firm, reserved attitude, prevent Germany from sending the whole of her army west of the Rhine, and, even if France should be defeated, attenuate as much as possible the effects of the disaster. For these reasons, it is declared, Russia will await the outcome of the different phases of the Bulgarian crisis with the greatest calmness; and it is supposed that this intention on the part of Russia explains the dallying in the negotiations for the settlement of the Bulgarian question now being carried on at Constantinople. The Journal de St.-Pétersbourg directly denies that Russia has impeded the settlement of the Bulgarian difficulty, and says: "The British Blue Book shows who is responsible for the original disturbance in Bulgaria. The English press should seek the cause elsewhere than in Russia."

An extensive plot has been discovered at Odessa for a Polish uprising in the event of a Russo-Austrian or Russo-German war. Many imperial officers and officials are implicated. Twenty persons have been arrested.

Saturday, the 19th, being the seventieth anniversary of the birth of King William of Holland, the people made it a holiday. The people of The Hague presented his Majesty with a casket, an address, and a Bible.

Dr. E. Schmit von Taverna, counsellor of the Austro-Hungarian Embassy at Berlin, has been appointed Austrian Minister at Washington in the place of Baron von Schaeffer, who has for some time been absent on leave.

King Humbert has issued an order to his army, in which he says that the Italian troops who displayed such gallantry and steadiness in the recent battles with the Abyssinians shed honor upon the Italian Army, and that their bravery will be imperishable in Italy's military history.

Signor Depretis has submitted the following Cabinet list to the King of Italy: Count di Robilant, Foreign Affairs; Signor Saracco, Interior; Signor Magliani, Finance; Signor Viale, War; Signor Brin, Marine; Signor Grimaldi, Public Works.

Archbishop Walsh of Dublin has subscribed $50 to the defence fund in behalf of Messrs. Dillon, O'Brien, Redmond, Crilly, and others.

The jury which sits on the case of Mr. Dillon and his associates at Dublin is made up of eight Protestants, one Quaker, and three Roman Catholics. It is expected that the jury will disagree, and the failure to convict the campaigners, it is thought, will be used by the Government as proof of the necessity for a coercion act.

Great excitement was caused in the House of Commons on Thursday evening, when Mr. Parnell's motion not to consider the rules of procedure before the Government should have disclosed its proposed legislation for Ireland was rejected by a vote of 242 against 107. Mr. Dillon, one of the defendants in the trial of the traversers at Dublin, made complaint of the jury panel, and the Speaker ruled him out of order because a previous motion had been made on the same subject. There were other attempts to continue the debate on the address in reply to the Queen's speech, but the address was adopted by a vote of 283 to 70. The situation developed by the Speaker's ruling is extremely serious, for it opens the way for the Government, whenever it anticipates an unpleasant discussion, to block it, by having a motion filed for debate on the same subject at some distant time.

Resolutions have been adopted at several popular meetings in Ireland protesting against the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons under which Mr. Dillon was not allowed to speak of jury packing.

Maj. Edward James Saunderson (Conservative), member of Parliament for North Armagh, has published a letter in which he declares that, if home rule be granted to Ireland, the Loyalists of that country have ample assurances from England that they will not have to battle alone against the Irish Cabinet.

The British Government has ordered the mounting and manning of artillery at all the forts on the Shannon, some of which have not been occupied for years.

A conference of the leaders of the Conservative party was held on Monday, at which Lord Salisbury expressed the hope that the Government would be able, by reforming the rules of procedure, to restore to the House of Commons its capacity for work and its reputation for courtesy, "after which," he added, "we shall be able to deal with the question of local government in Ireland and with other measures. In any case, all bills will be postponed until after the conclusion of the proceedings for reform of the procedure rules and action on the estimates. The Government expects to present the budget during the first week in April." The Prime Minister predicted a long long lease of office for the Conservatives. On the same day Sir William Vernon Harcourt said that the Round Table conferees were still laboring to reunite the Liberal party on a basis which should contain no deviation from Mr. Gladstone's fundamental principles respecting the Irish question; and the Liberal victory at Burnley was received with great delight by the Liberals, which they interpreted as foreshadowing the doom of the Unionists everywhere.

Mr. Gladstone, addressing a crowd at a railway station in Wales on Saturday, urged that the Welsh demand a settlement of the Irish question in order to secure attention for their own local concerns.

On Feb. 16 and the two following days, in all the chief cities of India impressive ceremonies were held in commemoration of the Queen's jubilee. In the Christian churches and in the native temples and mosques there were thanksgiving services. As many as 25,000 prisoners who had been incarcerated for debt or for offences against the civil or military law, were set free.

Mr. W. H. Smith said in the House of Commons, in answer to an inquiry, that it was not intended to release Irish or other convicts on the occasion of the Queen's jubilee. The release of prisoners in India in commemoration of the jubilee had been ordered by the Government in accordance with an Oriental custom. The order did not apply to Great Britain.

It is reported that the Queen will, during her jubilee year, establish an order of decoration, specially intended for the recognition of literary, artistic, and journalistic merit.

In the House of Commons Mr. Labouchere moved to censure the Government for its Bulgarian policy. The motion was negatived without a division.

Advices were received at San Francisco on Sunday of an eruption of the Hawaiian volcano Mauna Loa. The eruption began on January 16, when a column of fire shot up from the south crater. Two days later the whole district around the volcano was shaken by an almost constant succession of heavy earthquake shocks. Nothing was seen of lava until January 18, as it found an underground passage. On that day, however, it broke into view, and three great rivers of it took their course to the sea. One stream reached the ocean in two days, and the others were reported as not far behind in their course. Great destruction of property was caused, but no loss of life. Later advices are that the eruption had ceased on February 8, and that earthquake shocks were felt until January 26.

Sixty lives were lost by the recent floods at Brisbane, Queensland. The damage to property was very great.

Members of the Dominion Parliament were elected on Tuesday, and a small Conservative majority was returned.

THE NEXT PARTY ISSUE.

We cannot help thinking that the very recklessness with which Congress is trying to get rid of the surplus and prevent the reduction of taxation, combined with the demands of "Labor" on both the Federal and State Governments, is likely before long to make the question of the proper limits of the province of Government a party issue in a larger and more serious sense than it ever has been before. It divided the Whigs and the Democrats, it is true, in the early part of the century, but the wildest claims made by the Whigs for Government interference were trifles compared to the demands made on the State by the advocates of the paternal system to-day. The latter have got far beyond the aid to infant industries with which their fathers would have been content. Temporary aid from the Treasury for infant industries has grown into permanent aid to an unlimited extent to all industries, young or old, feeble or prosperous. The demand for popular education, to fit young Americans for the battle of life and the practice of the elementary virtues, is rapidly growing into a demand that the Government shall see to it that there is no battle of life, but that every poor man is taken care of and delivered from all temptation, from the cradle to the grave. In fact, we are, as President Cleveland pointed out in his veto of the Texas Seed Bill, almost brought face to face with the question whether the people shall support the Government, or the Government support the people.

The country is being ravaged in every direction by that extraordinary modern delusion that there is somewhere, in every country, an immense reservoir of the good things of this life, of which the great capitalists keep the key, but which Government, if it pleased, might throw open to the people. There is no such reservoir or store. There is no fact better ascertained than that if we were all to stop working and saving, in three years we should be a mob of ragged paupers, dying of cold and hunger in dilapidated buildings. Mankind cannot lay up great stores of either food or clothing. When the race is doing its best, with all the machinery at its command, it can only get two or three years ahead of its wants. Nature follows it up with the whip of necessity, and lashes it into ceaseless industry.

This great and chief hallucination contains or tends to another—that there is somewhere a depot of great administrators, from which the Government can draw all the officers it would need, to enable it to take care of all its citizens in health and disease, provide them with light work at good wages, and see that their homes are healthy, and that their vices or follies do not interfere with their success in life. All the schemes for making the Government "support the people" assume the existence of an indefinite number of candidates for office such as one never sees in office in our day, and such as all the corporations in the land search for vainly with the offer of enormous salaries.

Congress seems to have laid aside all scruple about nourishing these delusions. Almost all its legislation on social or economical questions during the last ten or fifteen years has tended to foster the belief that the good time coming in America was to be a time when everybody would be taken care of by somebody else, and when finally we should all draw subsistence and even luxuries from Government stores, produced by machinery worked by Government officers, and distributed, together with a reasonable amount of paper pocket money, to all who said that work tired them. This tendency cannot go much further without furnishing a very burning question to politics—such a one as has not been presented to the country since the abolition of slavery. The tariff was pretty sure to breed such an issue sooner or later, but its appearance is being greatly hastened by the "labor problem." Voters will, before very long, be called on to settle more clearly and definitely than ever the exact amount of work which the Government is to do for the private citizen in this country, and to remind people in some emphatic way that the Government is itself nothing more than a collection of plain men, like the rest of us, temporarily put in charge of a public subscription towards the general expenses, called the taxes. The extraordinary craze, too, which many politicians are encouraging, that people who save are public enemies, to be abused and abandoned to the fury of mobs, and compelled to support or take care of those who will not save, must be stamped out. It will be stamped out vigorously whenever it is submitted to the popular vote, and it looks now as if it would be submitted very soon—that is, as if the people who want the Government to support them would be emboldened to take the field as a political organization.

A GREAT CHANCE FOR LABOR REFORMERS.

We would respectfully remind all persons among us who have, during the past year or two, been interesting themselves in the condition of the laboring poor in this city, and especially those persons of intelligence and education who tried to make Henry George Mayor of New York as a general protest against the abuses of our municipal government, and all who see in the recent disturbances between employer and employed a demand for some radical change in the relations of these two classes—we would remind all these that there is now a chance for them, no matter what kind of reform they aim at, to make a good beginning in their work. The High-License Bill now before the Legislature will be, if it passes, the first step in any proposed solution of the labor problem, no matter what that proposed solution may be. No matter what plan of social regeneration a man may have, he must admit that the greatest of the evils from which the laboring poor now suffer is intemperance. Granting that all the charges made on behalf of the laborer against the capitalists and the monopolists are true; granting that all the stories told about legislative discrimination against labor are well-founded; granting that the rich are as heartless and indifferent as the poor say they are; granting that the present social organization is as unjust as Anarchists say it is, the fact remains that improvement in the laborer's condition is impossible without cutting down his drink bills. No social arrangement which man can make can benefit people who get drunk. No matter what wages you pay a drinking man, neither his condition nor that of his family can be improved thereby. There is no use in providing extra holidays for men who use them to get drunk. There is no use in cutting down the day's labor from ten to eight hours, if the two hours gained are spent in a rum-hole. There would be no use in making arbitration compulsory, if one of the parties was likely to be kept from obeying the decision by liquor. There would be no use in handing over all the property in the world to laboring men, if they drank as much as they do now. They would soon dissipate it, and add nothing to the store.

So also in this city there is not the smallest use in reforming the charter as long as liquor-dealers remain a power in politics. It is they who prevent the execution of the laws, who fill the courts and jails with criminals, who thrust corrupt men into high places, who are at the bottom of all the shameful "deals" and bargains which make so many good men despair of our Government. We owe to them more than to any one agency the filth of the streets and the wretchedness of our tenement-houses. The ignorance and folly which put thousands of poor men into the hands of the rapacious scoundrels who organize the strikes, are their doings. The violence and disorder by which every strike is accompanied, are their work also. Every group of strikers watching non-union laborers with murder in their hearts and eyes have a liquor store behind them, and are half full of bad rum, brandy, whiskey, or gin. It was the liquor-dealers who supplied the boodle Aldermen; it is their influence which keeps up the constant tinkering of the city charter at Albany. It is they who send thither the most powerful lobbies in support of every bit of legislation which the sober, honest, industrious, and intelligent portion of the community dreads. And they do not simply supply an existing demand for liquor—they spread the craving for it. They enlarge their own market every day. They set up their bars beside every school, and catch the boys of the community as soon as they begin to think of being men. They attack labor at every point at which it can be most easily damaged. They make it unreliable, wasteful, shiftless, improvident, unskilful. When a steady man has a good place, they get him kicked out of it for drunkenness; when a laborer's home is neat, orderly, clean, and comfortable, they convert it into an abode of squalor and filth, like the hut of the savage. There is no thinking man to-day in New York who does not know that if the liquor bills and liquor-dealers of this city could be cut down even two-thirds, there would be an improvement in our social and political condition which would astonish the whole country.

We therefore most earnestly ask those, of whatever way of thinking, who have at heart the elevation of the poor, to give the High-License Bill their active and energetic support. No matter what they aim at ultimately, they must see that no real improvement in the laborer's condition can be effected by law-making in a community which is ruled by liquor-dealers—that is, by men directly interested in the promotion of a habit which impoverishes and degrades. Let us all join in delivering the city from this awful curse. After that our ways may again separate, but we shall at least be able to discuss our differences before more intelligent and self-respecting audiences.

THE RULE OF THE CRIMINAL CLASSES.

THERE is a movement on foot among the decent Democrats in Baltimore to secure the assistance of the Legislature of Maryland to rescue the city from the control of the criminal classes. In pursuance of this endeavor Mr. John K. Cowen recently made a speech which was reported in the Cecil Democrat. To this speech, or to some part of it, the Baltimore Sun took exceptions, implying that Mr. Cowen's picture of the situation of Baltimore as a city governed by law-breakers and assassins was overdrawn. Mr. Cowen has replied in a letter, several columns in length, addressed to the Sun, in which he particularizes some of the facts upon which his speech was based, and by which the Democratic Mugwumps of Baltimore expect to justify their appeal to the Maryland Legislature. This appeal, it should be remarked, is not a petition for general reform to be reached through outside agency and intervention of the gods, but merely such amendment of the election laws as shall enable the people of Baltimore to secure honest and free elections at all times, and a true return of the votes cast.

The picture drawn by Mr. Cowen of the existing state of Baltimore politics is considerably worse than anything we can now recall in the history of municipal governments. It is distinctly worse than the Tweed régime in New York, because it adds murder to ballot-stuffing and the commoner forms of political debauchery, as an instrumentality for gaining and retaining power in the city government. In order to find any parallel to Mr. Cowen's narrative we must go back to the conflicts of Milo and Clodius in the last days of the Roman Republic.

Mr. Cowen seeks to establish three propositions, viz.: that in the primary elections in the city of Baltimore the candidates for State and municipal offices are selected by men of criminal character and by criminal means; that in such elections the majority does not govern, but that men of criminal record falsify the count, and, by different methods, distinctly criminal, reverse the will of the people; that the city officials who get office by these means recognize in their appointments their dependence upon the criminal class, and act in accordance with its demands. Mr. Cowen relies upon common rumor to prove that the primary elections of the Democratic party in Baltimore are carried by frauds committed by criminals for criminal purposes and with criminal means. The only instance cited is that in which Eugene Higgins took a conspicuous part, and which was pretty thoroughly exposed at the time when Higgins received an appointment in the Treasury Department at Washington.

Coming to the elections held in pursuance of law, Mr. Cowen first analyzes the character and records of the judges appointed to receive and count the votes of the respectable citizens of Baltimore in the last municipal election: Michael McCloskey, judge of election in the Eighth Ward, had been indicted and convicted of crime, and was further disqualified under the law by holding a city employment; Emil Telle, Ninth Ward, indicted, convicted, sent to jail, and pardoned; Michael Rolf, Tenth Ward, indicted for keeping a policy shop and found guilty, also indicted for assault with intent to kill, the Sheriff having become his bail and the case not being pushed; Henry Wich (Republican judge), First Ward, indicted, convicted, served in jail six months; Thomas Philbin, Fourteenth Ward, indicted nine times between November 24, 1882, and October 8, 1886; Robert Blunt, Sixth Ward, indicted and convicted as late as March 20, 1885; Charles P. Logue, Tenth Ward, indicted eight times between April 12, 1881, and July 3, 1883; Edward Kelly, indicted for assault with intent to kill and convicted of assault June 20, 1884. One of the judges, name not given, had been convicted of enticing young girls, under fifteen years of age, to houses of prostitution, and another had a mistress who had been convicted and sent to the penitentiary for eighteen months for the same offence. Two of these rascals, having a very long and dark criminal record, committed a murder while the Supervisors were making the appointments of judges of election. Instantly the Supervisors destroyed all the papers that might have showed how they came to appoint such characters to such responsible places; and in order to make sure of getting all the evidence out of the way, they destroyed even the official list of the judges, so that a correct list has never been published. The name of Higgins here turns up again. Says Mr. Cowen:

"We ask how it comes that when Curran has broken the solidity of a big ward, two of the most notorious cutthroats in the city are selected from outside the party, given offices in that ward, and immediately murder the man giving trouble? Do the Supervisors explain? Far from it. They immediately destroy the only evidence that can throw any light upon the matter or establish their own innocence, if they be innocent. It is not too much to say that they act precisely as the pickpocket does—throws away the purse as soon as he has gotten the money out of it. We ask why does Higgins come all the way from Washington down to Locust Point to tell a witness of that tragedy that it is a matter of no account and will 'blow over'? Again no explanation. Gentlemen, that fact, until it be explained, can have but one meaning, and that is that the murder of Curran was a thing for which the organization was responsible, was done as its measure, and that the murderers must be protected. Do you know any other explanation? If you do, I shall be interested to have it. We ask, What need has the party for a thing of darkness like Higgins at all, and why should he be kept in office at Washington against the remonstrance and to the disgust of the whole country?"

The transactions of this precious lot of election judges in their several precincts after they entered upon the performance of their duties are recited in detail. Every kind of fraud to make the return of the votes different from the true one was resorted to, with the ascertained result of falsifying more than 9,000 votes in the last municipal election. Mr. Cowen closes his letter with the simple inquiry whether the people of Maryland desire to have their chief city given over in permanence to the rule of the criminal classes. If such is their preference, they have only to leave things as they are. But really there is no such thing as permanence in this kind of a government. The next stage will be fighting in the streets between different bands of the criminal classes, like the battle between Milo and Clodius and their gladiators in the Appian Way.

"THE SOLDIER VOTE."

THE only reason why Congress passed the Dependent Pension Bill was because Congressmen supposed that support of it would "make them solid" with "the soldier vote." The general public did not appear to take much interest in the matter, but the Washington claim agents had worked up an apparent demand for the measure on the part of the veterans, and it was solely the idea that support of the bill would strengthen Senators and Representatives with the soldiers among their constituents, which gave it an overwhelming majority.

The theory upon which this action was based, baldly stated, is that the ex-soldiers of the Union Army are open to bribery, and that their votes may be captured by special appropriations for them as a class from the public Treasury. This theory has been generally held by the politicians ever since the war, and has now come to be accepted as gospel by the average Congressman of either party. The alarming growth of the pension list, which, but for the President's veto, would have given us a standing army of beneficiaries far larger than the standing army of fighting men in such great Powers as France or Germany, was due not to disinterested love of the Union veterans, but to a belief that they were so mercenary in their character that they would support any public man who voted them money, and oppose any public man who voted against any such grant.

And yet, like so many other traditions, this theory has no foundation in fact. Indeed, it has been demonstrated over and over again that the facts are directly opposed to the theory. Both positively and negatively it has been proved beyond possibility of doubt that "the soldier vote" is not a bribable vote; that the man who tries to secure it by championing unjustifiable pension bills does not succeed; that the man who stands by his convictions in opposing such measures gains rather than loses among the soldiers themselves. The occasion is timely for citing some notable illustrations of this truth, which just now so much needs to be brought out.

In the Forty-fifth Congress the Democrats had a good majority in the House, and the Chairman of the Pension Committee was Americus V. Rice, an Ohio Democrat. Mr. Rice's Committee reported the Arrears of Pensions Act—an utterly unjustifiable measure, under which the vast sum of $218,000,000 has already been distributed—and the Democratic House passed it with a whoop. In 1877 the Democrats had elected their candidate as Governor of Ohio by 22,000 votes, and in 1878 the contest for minor State offices had been so close that Democratic success in 1879 appeared probable. To make assurance doubly sure, the Democrats resolved to capture "the soldier vote" by nominating Gen. Rice and Gen. Ewing, another old soldier who had supported the Arrears Act, for the first two places on their ticket. The result was that Foster, a civilian, was elected Governor over Ewing by 17,129 votes, and Rice was beaten for Lieutenant-Governor by 15,598 votes. Such was the sequel to the championship of the Arrears Act.

For two or three years past a little band of greedy schemers, who appear to "run" the Grand Army organization in Massachusetts, have been diligently pushing the "service pension" project, which would place on the roll every man who ever served three months in the Union Army. The self-respecting veterans of Massachusetts were hostile to the job, but on the surface it appeared to be popular with the soldiers. Such was the conclusion of Congressman Lovering of the Sixth District, and accordingly he became the zealous advocate of the scheme. In 1884, Lovering was elected over the Republican candidate by 265 plurality; in 1886, after two years' effort to capture "the soldier vote" by pushing the service-pension project, he was defeated by 728 plurality.

The moral of Lovering's defeat was happily enforced by the fortune at the same election of Mr. Henry B. Peirce, for several years Secretary of State in Massachusetts. Mr. Peirce had made himself conspicuous by a manly fight against this job, and the schemers declared that he should be "snowed under" by "the soldier vote." Election came on, and the result of their threat was this: For Governor on the Republican ticket Mr. Ames had 122,346 votes; for Secretary of State Mr. Peirce had 122,684 votes.

Even more striking was the result of a similar issue in the Rochester Congressional District last fall. The service-pension scheme had somehow got a foothold among the Grand Army men there, and Mr. Baker, the Republican candidate, came out unequivocally and enthusiastically in favor of it. Mr. Bacon, the Democratic candidate, being directly questioned on this very subject by a deputation of would-be pensioners, answered not only that he did not favor such a measure, but declared that he was "resolutely and unalterably opposed" to it. The publication of this answer, so far from injuring him, brought him hundreds of Republican votes, even from soldiers, and carried his total several hundred above that for Judge Peckham, the Democratic candidate for Judge of the Court of Appeals, while Baker ran behind Daniels, the Republican candidate for Judge, the totals being: For Republican Judge, 13,254; for Republican Congressman, bidding for "the soldier vote," 13,170; for Democratic Judge, 10,050; for Democratic Congressman, "resolutely and unalterably opposed" to a pension job, 10,509.

The reception of President Cleveland's pension veto by the Union veterans shows that his action in this matter is to receive similar treatment by all self-respecting soldiers. The Evening Post publishes a number of the letters which he received before his decision, praying for a veto, and after his veto thanking him for it. "It originated with claim agents and professional pension-seekers," wrote one old soldier, "and is not the cry or plea of the great body of veterans. The only cry they have now is that you will spare them the honor of having served their country because they loved her, and not as mere bounty and pension-seekers." The heartiness of the praise awarded him by Republican ex-soldiers is especially noteworthy. "Many times I have had occasion to commend your manly course," writes one; "but I write now to thank you, as an old soldier and a patriotic citizen, for your veto of the Dependent Pension Bill." "I write to thank you for vetoing the Dependent Pension Bill," says another. "I volunteered (under the call of President Lincoln) on the day after the attack on Fort Sumter, entering the ranks when I might have had an 'office,' and I think I have some right to speak as a volunteer soldier." As for the political effect of Mr. Cleveland's action among old soldiers, "A Cavalryman's" letter in the same paper undoubtedly represents the drift in saying—

"President Cleveland is entitled to the gratitude of the country for vetoing this iniquitous measure, and also for exposing the fraudulent character of so many of the private pension bills passed by Congress. I am opposed to him in politics, but he can have my vote next time if no better Republican than 'Jim' Blaine can be found to oppose him. In my judgment he has made a good President, and his general policy has been to ignore mere politics and serve the best interests of the people."

It is good to have the fact demonstrated that the old soldiers are, first of all, good citizens, and that "the soldier vote" cannot be captured by demagogues offering great bribes from the public Treasury. If it were otherwise, if our Union veterans were really the mercenaries they have been taken for by the demagogues, the prospect would be most gloomy, for they constitute an army of voters now, as they did an army of soldiers twenty-five years ago. But happily they do not differ from good citizens who were not soldiers, and they share that feeling which prompts one man to write Mr. Cleveland as follows:

"I am a Republican of over thirty years' standing, and during all that time have known of no act of any administration that has pleased me more than that of vetoing the Pension Bill lately passed by Congress. It is the most flagitious and cowardly measure I have ever known, and I sincerely thank you for vetoing it."

ARE ENGLISHMEN INTERESTED IN POLITICS?

LONDON, February 11, 1887.

THE question with which I have headed this letter may seem, at first sight, a strange one. No one who takes up an English newspaper, no one who reads an English magazine, no one who peruses the speeches of English politicians, can doubt that England is in the midst of a political crisis which excites the keen interest of the English people. The existence of the crisis is past denial; what is much more doubtful is the keenness of popular interest.

Let there, however, be no mistake about my meaning. It were the idlest folly to waste the columns of the Nation in maintaining the idle paradox that Englishmen took no interest in public affairs. It were almost equally silly to argue that because men and women in England pursued their private business, and enjoyed their private pleasures, while something like a revolution was impending over the country, they did not really care whether home rule was or was not granted to Ireland. No political change ever arouses the kind of universal and intense interest which historians are too apt to attribute even to petty party contests. In the very height of the Reign of Terror, millions of Frenchmen pursued, we may be sure, the calm tenor of their lives, undisturbed by fear of the guillotine or by aspirations after an ideal republic. During the Lord George Gordon riots the theatres of London were, I believe, open, and respectable spectators contemplated with calm curiosity the fires kindled by the mob. But though it be a truth, and an important truth, that the storms of politics always leave the peace of private life to a great extent undisturbed, it is also true that the degree to which citizens of a country are occupied with the welfare of the state differs immensely in different ages and in different countries. My inquiry is certainly meant to suggest the inference that Englishmen are far less interested in the matters which concern Parliament than were their forefathers, and perhaps than are at this moment the inhabitants of other countries.

One fact is as certain as anything can be which depends upon merely historical evidence. During the eighteenth and the earlier part of the nineteenth century, the class of Englishmen whose wishes determined the destinies of the nation were intensely and even passionately occupied in public affairs. Every foreigner—such a man, for example, as Voltaire—who visited England, was at once struck with the political spirit of English society. Partisanship, violence, or corruption could with more or less reason or plausibility be charged against English party leaders and their followers. The one charge which no one ever brought either against the nation or against its statesmen, was the vice of indifference or apathy. Goldsmith was not a subtle or a profound thinker. Lightness of thought, as of touch, is the characteristic quality of his work. But if he took life lightly, he observed it acutely, and any one who peruses either "The Traveller" or 'The Citizen of the World,' will see at once what was the impression made upon Goldsmith by the world around him. It seemed to him, as it no doubt really was, a world of politicians, and of politicians who, though they might gamble away the fortunes of their country, pursued the game of politics with the passionate enthusiasm of gamblers. No doubt the classes who found their chief interest in public affairs were in the main the classes who shared the power and the gains of Government. But the spirit of the wealthy affected the tone even of the poor. The exquisite account given by 'The Citizen of the World' of the conversation between the imprisoned debtor and the drunken soldier is, as evidence of a state of feeling, worth hundreds of heavy dissertations by learned historians. The debtor is determined to take up arms against French invaders, because Frenchmen were slaves who knew nothing of liberty. The soldier, who interlards his conversation with the hottest oaths, is resolved to die in defence of his country because Frenchmen are Papists and would, if victorious, destroy English religious freedom. Satire is not to be read like an affidavit, but the exaggerations of a satirist must be based on truth. If debtors in England were not always devotees of a freedom which they did not themselves enjoy, and if drunken dragoons were not invariably zealous Protestants, we may yet be assured that, in Goldsmith's time, the men who filled the prisons and the army—English regiments, by the way, were in George the Third's time constantly recruited from the hulks—were, like the rich and the noble, inspired by the sentiment of intense pride in the civil and religious liberties of England. "When a butcher," says Johnson, "tells you that his heart bleeds for his country, he feels no real sensation." This is true, but when butchers shed even rhetorical tears over the fate of their country, we may be convinced that the mass of the people glow with the passion either of patriotism or of party spirit.

Johnson, Burke, Boswell, Goldsmith, all the members of the Club, were more or less typical representatives of English society, and no one who reads Boswell's pictures of the men among whom he moved, can doubt for a moment that the vast majority of them were what would now be called violent politicians.

If we come down to a later time, we still find public matters occupying almost to excess the attention of the nation. Whoever will take up any biography of the men who lived between say 1800 and 1848, will be struck with the keenness of their feeling about every great political movement. The advocates of the Reform Bill believed that an alteration in the constitution of Parliament would introduce a political millennium. The opponents of reform thought that the abolition of rotten boroughs was but the first step towards a reign of terror, and it is quite certain that what leading men thought and said (not only, be it remarked, in public, but also in their private letters and journals) was said and thought by thousands whose names are forgotten, or have never been known beyond the circle of their families. Arnold was a clergyman and a schoolmaster, living in the quietest of English counties, yet he certainly, unless my memory deceives me, expressed in 1829 or 1830 a fear lest the prevalent violence of party feeling should lead to something like civil war. The virulence of party invective with regard even to the highest persons in the state was, half a century ago, something to which modern political controversy can afford no parallel. Invective is, it is true, often unreal, but words are, after all, the sign of feelings, and the rhetoric of party abuse gives some, though by no means a conclusive, proof of general interest in the result of political conflicts.

Contrast, now, the fact to which I have tried to direct attention, with at any rate the superficial phenomena of modern English society. England is in the midst of a movement which, whatever be its issue, must vitally affect the Constitution of the country. A proposed alteration in the English Constitution is, in Ireland at least, closely connected with social changes. Politics proverbially become exciting when they touch on matters connected with the rights of property, and no one, whatever be his party bias, dreams of denying that in Ireland the agrarian question and the political question are closely connected together. Discussions about home rule are for the moment merging in disputes about the Plan of Campaign. Nothing, it will be admitted, more surely embitters party spirit than the introduction of religious differences into the field of public affairs. This element of bitterness is not wanting to the home-rule controversy. The position and rights of the Irish Protestants, and the influence or policy of the Catholic priesthood, cannot be put out of sight by any one called upon to make up his mind for or against home rule. To all this may be added that, behind differences of view as to the government of Ireland, lie hidden, or only half hidden, essential differences of opinion or of sentiment as to the government of England, and indeed as to the whole relation between the state and individuals.

Here, it might be thought, we have every element which ought to excite the keenest interest, not to say the most vehement passion, throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain. Now, no sensible man will assert that public feeling has not been stirred. A careful observer may think—and, as it seems to me, with reason—that the time of excitement and passion is coming nearer and nearer. It would cause me much pain, but no great surprise, to find that, as the contest about home rule grows hotter, differences of opinion on public affairs may disturb the harmony of private life. All I can say is, that hitherto it has been very difficult to find signs of unmistakable interest on the part of the general public in the great political battle which is conventionally supposed to engross universal attention. It is almost impossible to believe that our fathers or our grandfathers would, on such an occasion as the present, have displayed anything like the calmness of their descendants. Prudence, moderation, and self-control are admitted virtues. No one can rate their political value too highly. But they are moral graces, it must be admitted, which men are apt to display with most ease in reference to any subject which does not greatly touch their feelings. Calmness is apt to be allied with indifference, and the political calmness of modern Englishmen suggests a waning interest in politics. Of the causes which may have produced this decline in the political spirit of the nation, I hope to say something in another letter. AN OBSERVER.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE INTEREST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A burst of applause from the country has followed the veto of the general Pension Bill. The courage of the President has rescued his constituents from the folly, not to say the wickedness, of the inorganic mass of Congress, swayed by the intrigues of wire-pullers, of whom the pension agents are only one sample, It is an interesting illustration of the relation which the President, as the representative of the whole nation, bears to the anarchy of local and private interests. But, after all, it is only negative action. As the oyster does not seek its food, but lies with its mouth open till the food tumbles into it, so the President must remain passive till the freaks of Congress furnish him material for digestion or rejection, the choice being generally as to the least of two evils. He has to sit an idle spectator of ground and lofty tumbling, till the scuffling acrobats fall outside of the arena, and then to thrust them back again.

But if this negative action excites such interest through the country, just imagine what positive action would do. If only the ringmaster could apply the whip directly to the animals, or (to be parliamentary) if, through his chosen agents, he could publicly demand and insist that Congress should take up and consider with some system and definiteness the state of the finances, of the tariff, of the navy, of the Indians, and so on! It might be thought that the position of the President would itself become less dignified and important, or what Napoleon called, in reference to the Abbé Sieyès's constitution, that of a "cochon à l'engrais," but this does not follow. He could announce his own policy clearly in his messages, and his Cabinet would be merely his servants to carry out that policy, holding their places only as long as they did so, or, in other words, would be responsible to him and not to Congress. It does not appear that he would be any less dignified in relation to legislation than he is (and there is nothing like it in the world) as the chosen representative of sixty millions of people.

One thing is made clearer by this event, and that is, that in proportion as the President does his duty, as he is less governed by party politics and more by considerations of the national interest, he becomes less the representative of one party against the other, and more that of the country against Congress. Hence, it follows that it is of no use to look to Congress to increase and extend his power over their deliberations. That must be done by popular agitation and a direct appeal to the people by somebody or some organization, to force the hand of Congress in this direction.

I am tempted to add a comment on the letter of your correspondent, "L. N. D.," who argues that no progress can be expected from Congress, because he finds that in thirty-five years' experience the members from his district have been of a very inferior class, and yet, he thinks, quite equal to those from the rest of the country. The reason is very simple, that members are not chosen for what they do at Washington (for unless they are of a kind to descend to pure intrigue they can do nothing), but on account of their management of the political machine at home. Any one who will read the account, in Woodrow Wilson's 'Congressional Government,' of the fate of a member who tries by honorable public action to promote any measure of public interest, will easily see the reason of this.

When the public business is so systematized and organized that it can be taken out of the committee-rooms to the open sessions of the houses; when the motives, the action, and the influence of members can be seen and appreciated, not only by their constituents, but by the country; when ability can thus make its mark, and honorable distinction be gained, then the conditions of election will be changed, and the standard of character of members be steadily raised. But that can only be done by placing the conduct of business in the hands of responsible executive leaders—that is to say, responsible, not to Congress, but to the country. G. B.

ETHICS OF LAND TENURE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A learned friend of mine, with earnest aspirations for the highest private and public morality, in tracing the wordy rhetoric of 'Progress and Poverty' to its real origin in the ninth chapter of Spencer's 'Social Statics,' seems to me to have somewhat confused the quality of practical discrimination, respecting which our sober race entertains a pretty good opinion of itself. It is not surprising that many who, like him, have been accustomed to follow with conviction the thoughts and conclusions of Mr. Spencer, should continue to yield their minds to him when he comes to extremely doubtful ground; and it is perhaps the ability and originality of his arguments on the morality of land tenure which induced Mr. Henry George to think them worthy of appropriation.

But Mr. Spencer is by no means the only scientist who has stumbled on strange paths, and it is not unnatural for his arguments to lose their force when they wander from the firm ground of experienced investigation to the more complex questions of public ethics and economy. While mathematical argument may be safely based on the fixed and solid facts which are accessible in the natural sciences, we know that definite and unshifting facts in social ethics are few in number, and subject to no end of qualifications, changes, and exceptions under the shifting circumstances of civilized social life. Mr. Spencer says: "We have here nothing to do with considerations of conventional privilege or legislative convenience. We have simply to inquire what is the verdict given by pure equity in the matter; and this verdict enjoins a protest against every existing pretension to the individual possession of the soil," because "the right of mankind at large to the earth's surface is still valid, all deeds, customs, and laws notwithstanding." It is for that reason, stated in different forms and with all the consummate argument of which that great teacher is master, that he concludes, "Equity, therefore, does not permit property in land."

But no individual, however eminent, has any right to set up his own standard of so controverted a subject as "equity," and condemn all conflicting public law and usage. What is pure equity? What is equity, pure or impure? Had it ever in any age, or has it now, any common or accepted definition? Those spiritual religionists who think that solution of ethical questions is obtainable through prayer, by the special interposition of the Deity in each heart, have their view of it, while Mr. Bentham and his followers insist that equity, conscience, and words of kindred meaning only express the standard of strictly utilitarian social policy prevalent at the time and place, which standard constantly varies from age to age, and between different societies during the same age. Between those wide extremes exist a myriad definitions of every shade, each supported in learned essays and by a host of followers. Who is to decide between them? Manifestly, every seeker after truth, each for himself and on his own responsibility. No mortal being, whatever his own convictions, has a right to set up his particular ideal of equity, and square down to its doubtful and narrow edge the polity, usages, laws, and conscience of the rest of mankind. There never was, and cannot be, any common standard of "equity." Can the same standard prevail, for instance, in war and peace—with the preacher in his pulpit and the policeman in a riot—with the girl at a ball and the sailor shipwrecked among hungry savages? Surely not. How, then, shall we presume to try any right by an arbitrary standard which varies among different societies and peoples, and changes its meaning from generation to generation?

So much for "equity" as a standard. But it is a still more pernicious fallacy to treat land tenure as a question of equity at all. Nature has given many other things to "mankind at large," i. e., to him who first appropriates, and equity has no more to do with the appropriation of land than with that of a deer or a fish or a lump of coal. It is a question not of equity but of social policy. Fully three-fourths of the globe is unoccupied by civilized inhabitants, and its treasures of soil, minerals, and forests are unappropriated and therefore not yet required. When in future ages every acre shall be billeted with its inhabitant, then it may become necessary, as with the overladen boat at sea, to decide which shall be sacrificed. But even in such case, since all have an equal right to life, it is policy and not equity which must pronounce the stern decree. But, for ages to come, perhaps during the existence of the human race, it is open to any man who will work and save, to exchange his savings for a part of the earth's surface; and whether the occupancy thus acquired shall be exclusive and perpetual, is not a matter of ethics, but of policy. And the moment we come to treat it as such, and proceed to examine such policy by the abundant light of history and experience, we shall immediately appreciate the facts that no form of civilization ever arose without it; that it has been invariably associated with all social progress; that every race which failed to appreciate or enforce it has been superseded by better ones; and that (outside of abnormal religious enthusiasm) nothing noble, strong, or good ever asserted or maintained itself except by the daring and effort of individuals largely incited by ambitious hopes for themselves and dependents, of which the acquisition and tenure of land was first and chief.

In every free society, municipal law but expresses the standard of social equity and policy prevailing at the place and time, and it is simply matter of fact and observation that, from the beginning of history, social progress, notwithstanding local and temporary exceptions, has, in the long run, been in exact proportion with the efficacy of opinion and law in maintaining rights of property once acquired in the most fixed and responsible of all earthly possessions. THE LABOR VOTE IN PHILADELPHIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The labor vote at the Philadelphia municipal election on Tuesday last has a significance which would seem to merit attention. Philadelphia is preëminently a city of organized labor, and there is probably no other community in which so heavy a vote would be polled on any question (if such there be) in which the interests of labor could be recognized as antagonistic to those of the rest of the citizens. For months the labor agitators have been busy in organizing a political party and boasting of the impression which they would produce at the polls. On the eve of the election Mr. Henry George was brought here, and addressed a meeting computed to number not less than 3,000. The result was, that in a total poll of about 155,000 the leading candidate on the labor ticket received 1,664 votes. It is evident that labor agrarianism has no promising field of development in our distinctively industrial community.

Various causes could doubtless be named as contributing to this, but the leading one is not far to seek. In Philadelphia the most noteworthy social fact is the exceptionally wide distribution of property. From statistics furnished to me by the Assessors' Office, it appears that the number of individual owners of real estate may be estimated at about 90,000. If each of these represents a family averaging six members, it thus appears that one-half the population is directly interested in the land as owners. Besides this, through our system of "Building and Loan Associations," which in great measure play the part of savings banks, vast numbers not landowners are interested in land-ownership through mortgages held by the associations. Such a community is not likely to listen with favor to the theories of Mr. George, who, though a native of our city, very naturally prefers to live in the more congenial atmosphere of New York.

Very closely connected with this is another social fact of importance. The number of separate dwelling-houses in Philadelphia is, in round numbers, 182,000. Of these about 40,000 are valued, including the lots, at less than $1,000, and about 60,000 at between $1,000 and $2,000. As a rule, among the temperate industrial classes, every family expects to have a house to itself, and those who occupy rented houses live in the hope of some day owning their own rooftree, for which, under our system of building, every facility is furnished. Those who are not landowners, therefore, have at least their little outfits of furniture and their hopes of future ownership. Such men offer poor material for socialistic and agrarian agitation. What they own they have earned by hard labor and thrifty self-denial, and they are not disposed to share it with the shiftless, the idle, and the improvident.

What is called the labor question is too complicated a problem to be solved by a single factor; but I think the above facts show how at least one of its most menacing aspects is capable of solution, and of solution in a manner conducive to the elevation of humanity. Of course peculiar difficulties are presented by the topographical features of New York, rendering minute subdivision of property impossible; but there are few other American cities of magnitude in which the methods which have proved successful in Philadelphia would not in a generation produce the same results.—Respectfully yours, H. C. L.

OFFICE-HOLDERS AS POLITICAL WORKERS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the first number of the Epoch is an interesting discussion of the question whether public officers should actively engage in party politics. Elihu Root speaks for the Republican, Carl Schurz for the Independent, and Edward M. Shepard for the Democratic view of the case. The last, it must be said, is rather an excuse for the alleged inconsistencies of the President than a discussion of the question.

I do not wish here to enter upon the merits of the case, but merely to examine the principal consideration which leads Mr. Root to the conclusion that public officers should engage in party politics: "What we need in American politics is not so much to prevent intelligent people from doing their political duty, as to induce them to do it," he tells us. "Our general tendency is from the condition of a people who were eager to govern themselves, to that of a people who are willing to be governed by others."

Perhaps both propositions are true. Nevertheless, why is it desirable that intelligent citizens should engage in politics or that the American people should govern themselves? Is political activity or self-government an absolute good, a desirable end, or are they good only as they aid in bringing about needed legislation and good government? And if the latter, is it not equally clear that it is honest and conscientious, as well as intelligent, participation in politics and government which is calculated to secure these ends? It follows that it is highly desirable to eliminate or restrain the ignorant, prejudiced, and dishonest vote, or to have it directed and controlled by men of the other class so as to do as little harm as possible.

Mr. Root seems, therefore, to affirm the following propositions:

(1.) Public officers form the most honest, intelligent, and conscientious portion of the American people.

(2.) This class has a strong tendency to shirk that political activity which the country needs at their hands.

(3.) The active partisan effort of public officers, paid by the people and including State and municipal governments, controlling a patronage of more than two hundred million dollars annually, will tend to eliminate, restrain, or wisely direct the ignorant, dishonest, and purchasable vote.

With these ideas, he ought to hold, further, that it is the duty of the President to issue an order requiring all Federal office-holders to exert themselves to the utmost, and use all means at their command to subserve party interests.

A BLIND GUIDE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue for February 10 you say, upon your highest editorial authority, that, during the political campaign of 1884, an Episcopal rector of Erie, Pa., was dismissed from his parish because he refused to vote for Blaine. You will pardon me, I hope, when I challenge the statement. No such incident occurred there during the campaign of 1884, or at any other time, either to an Episcopal rector or to a pastor of any other denomination. I have been intimately acquainted with the local history of Erie for years.

Were the zeal of the Nation as ardent for truth as it is to find something mean to say about Blaine, whether true or false, its readers would be more certain that some of its other "facts" are not made from similar Erie whole cloth.—I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully yours, EUGENE M. CAMP.

PHILADELPHIA, February 12, 1887.

[We did not say what Mr. Camp charges us with saying, but we find to our regret that in what we did say we were misled by a Blaine organ. In an unguarded moment we gave credence to what we read in its columns about the matter in question, but now learn, on inquiry, that its statements were just about as "ardent for truth" as those so frequent in the Blaine press of the time on the subject of Plymouth Church and Mr. Beecher. Mr. Camp will forgive us, we are sure, on our solemn promise never again to believe an unsupported assertion of a Blaine newspaper.—ED. NATION.]

NEVADA ORANGES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In the current number of the Century magazine, the writers of the 'Life of Abraham Lincoln' speak of Nevada as "that land of silver and cactus, of the orange and the sage-hen." As to the silver, the cactus, and the sage-hen, the description is doubtless correct, but the reference to the orange assumes an extension of the citrus belt that will cause profound surprise to the residents of the Pacific Slope. This slip in regard to Nevada prepares us for the misspelling of Sutter's name (Suttar appearing for Sutter) in the allusion to California, and makes us hesitate to set down the error as an oversight of the proof-reader.—Sincerely yours, J. ELMORE.

THE WRONG JOHN COTTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The following literary discovery is announced in the Sunday Record, Boston, February 13:

"I must not close, my dear Everard, without mentioning a Theocritus that I recently found in an English catalogue in which I was hunting for some editions of the poet to add to my collection. This little volume bears the date 1683; but what makes it so curious and interesting to me is the fact that it is dedicated to Dr. John Cotton, our first Boston minister. This furnishes a point of view in regard to Cotton which is certainly not the common one; and it amused me greatly when I first noticed it. The first words of the dedication are as follows: 'Nobilitate, Virtute, Eruditione ac summa Humanitate conspicuo Viro, D.D. Johanni Cottono Equiti Aurato & Baronetto. Maximo Literarum Literatorumque Patrono, Domine suo benevolentissimo, ac summa observentia in perpetuum colendo, Author S.P.D.' I am sure I never before thought of Amaryllis & Berenice in connection with that old Puritan. The edition itself is disappointing, but the long dedicatory introduction is very interesting, and will amuse you sometime, when we get a chance to talk some things over together in the old way by the fire.

"Very faithfully yours,
"W. M. FULLERTON."

I say nothing of the strangeness of a dedication in 1683 to a man who died in 1652, because this edition might be a reprint. But I do wonder at the care taken to style Rev. John Cotton of Boston a knight and baronet, because, from modesty no doubt, he carefully concealed those honors during his lifetime. And I wonder how this appropriation of honors pleased the worthy Sir John Cotton, Bart., of Connington, grandson of that famous Sir Robert who founded the Cottonian Library. This Sir John succeeded his father (Sir Thomas) in 1662, and died December 12, 1702. Very strangely, his monument bears an inscription showing that he was fond of literature, and that he gave the library to the public use. But, of course, he was not the person mentioned in the foregoing preface.

By the way, it might have been noted that this Sir John Cotton, Bart., had a son John who married the daughter of that typical Yankee, Sir George Downing, of whom New England is both proud and ashamed. This connection with the Theocritus, though rather far-fetched, is at least substantial, and might have been dragged in safely to tickle our vanity on a Sunday morning.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE ELECTIVE SYSTEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: President Charles Kendall Adams, in his article in the Contemporary Review for January on "University Education in the United States," speaking of the gradual relinquishment of the old-fashioned curriculum, and of the unsatisfactoriness of the plan of "parallel courses," says: "All of the more prominent universities, however, have felt themselves obliged to seek the same ends by other means. Harvard University has been the leader of this third movement, and the means by which its ends have been accomplished is known as the 'Elective System.'"

It is rather surprising to see such a statement at this late day and from such a source. Surely it is not too much to expect that one in high position, writing in a prominent review on this topic, should know what university did take the lead in this matter, as it has known no other system from its foundation by Thomas Jefferson. No better correction of the error can be given than in the words of Prof. Noah K. Davis, in an article in the February Forum, "Religious Exercises in State Schools." Speaking of the system of voluntary religious exercises in the University of Virginia, he says:

"Here then, we have the experiment fairly and fully tried through sixty years. While, just now, other colleges are timidly groping their way toward freedom in religious exercises, as well as toward elective studies, as though these were untried and dangerous experiments, there, the elective system throughout, and absolute freedom from any religious constraint, have long been constantly practised, with such results that no intelligent observer has ever dreamt of a wish to restore mediæval shackles, either in education or in religion. Virginia is a slow old State, they say; not making much progress. It may be so. But it would seem that, in some things, before pushing on farther, she can afford to wait till the rest catch up."

Respectfully yours, A. H.
UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI.

THE DEGREE OF A.B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Not only is the college degree of A.B. delightfully indefinite, but it is worse than indefinite. For, while the public are taught to believe it a symbol of good work done in some of the departments of the college menu, in fact it often means nothing more than that its receiver has managed to remain four years at college without having been guilty of any violent disregard of college laws, and has shown during that time that he has tried to study some one or two subjects.

When academies are permitted to give college degrees, a two-fold injustice is enacted. Such a giving of college degrees is unjust both to the public and to the poor student, who will sooner or later learn to his sorrow the great difference between his A.B. and, for example, that from Yale.

While I, too, "am a thorough believer in the elective system, yet I do not believe that any one is entitled to the degree of A.B." who has not done a certain amount of brain work, who has not been educated up to a certain point. It is by no means necessary that A have done the same work in kind as B for him to receive the same degree; but it is necessary that they be equally educated, equally equipped for future work along their respective lines. For example, just how much French and German is an equivalent for a certain amount of Greek is for the gentlemen of the faculties of our colleges—not academies—to decide. That the equation cannot be made with mathematical truth, is no argument against the approximation of the truth. Let us learn something in this matter of college degrees from our cousins across the water. JESSE T. LITTLETON.

DISGUISED ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of your recent numbers had an article calling attention to the wrong many newspapers did their readers by publishing advertisements in the form or guise of reading matter, without anything to show its true character.

I think this must have escaped the notice of the publishers of the Boston Advertiser and Transcript, as yesterday both printed the enclosed advertisement of one of the biggest stock-jobbing electric enterprises going, in such a way as to lead the unwary to suppose it to be merely a matter of public interest; and in the Transcript copy the illusion was shrewdly made more complete by placing it directly under the staring heading "Postscript," as if it had just come over the wires from New York and was altogether too important a matter to keep back a moment. When such a generally high-toned and deservedly respected paper as the Transcript lends or sells itself to this kind of deception, it is time that its readers protest.

It may be claimed, in defence, that no deception was intended, and that the true character of the article was evident. This I cannot admit. If it made no difference in its value to the advertising party, why was it not marked "advertisement"? and how does the offence against business morality differ, except in degree, from accepting money for writing financial articles for the purpose of "booming" worthless stocks?

THAT RUSSIAN BEGGAR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Here is another of Plastonoff's pusillanimous schemes. It bears the same heading as that reported in the Nation of February 17, and runs thus:

"KIEW, October 15, 1886.
"DEAR SIR: Supposing to translate into the Russian your great work, 'Two Years in the Jungle,' I ask your permission for translation. Should you favor me with an affirmative answer to this request, I hope you will be good enough to send me a copy of the book, with your autograph.
"I am, dear sir, yours most respectfully,
"ROMAN PLASTONOFF."

The scheme was a good one, for it flattered my personal vanity most powerfully. But the artful dodger calmly reposing in the last sentence was too apparent to be overlooked, and the little scheme miscarried. With me Mr. Plastonoff is out of pocket to the extent of his postage and his time. At first I resolved to write him a sarcastic reply, but on second thought it seemed that the game was not worth the candle. Now that I know the extent of his dishonest scheming for books, thanks to the Nation, it will afford me great pleasure to reply to his request in a manner befitting the occasion.—Yours very truly,
WILLIAM T. HORNADAY.

Notes.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' spring announcements include Laveleye's 'Balkan Peninsula'; 'Scotland as It Was and as It Is,' by the Duke of Argyll—an illustrated octavo; 'Two Years in Europe,' by Prof. Rodney Glisan, M.D., likewise illustrated; the following in the "Nations" series—Persia, by S. G. W. Benjamin, Assyria (in continuance of Chaldea), by Z. A. Ragozin, Ancient Egypt, by Prof. Rawlinson, Alexander's Empire, by Prof. J. P. Mahaffy; a new series, entitled "English History as Told by Contemporary Writers," edited by F. York Powell; 'The Memorials of Half a Century,' by Bela Hubbard; and 'Sketches in Song,' by Prof. Geo. L. Raymond of Princeton College.

Under the title of "The Theological Educator," Thomas Whittaker will publish at short intervals a series of manuals, edited by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., in conjunction with other British scholars and theologians. 'A Grammar of New Testament Greek,' 'The Thirty-nine Articles,' 'Preaching,' 'The Creeds,' 'A Manual of Christian Evidences,' are some of the forthcoming issues.

From the Government Printing Office we have the great volume of the Fish and Fisheries Commissioner's Report for 1884. It embraces the usual variety of matter, from details of the operations of the Commission on sea and land to an account of driven wells for the water supply of the station at Wood's Holl, and an experimental discussion of the comparative digestibility of fish flesh. The third volume in the series called 'Mineral Resources of the United States' has appeared for the year 1885. Natural gas, fertilizers, mineral paints, building stone, besides the precious and base metals, are some of the topics discussed from a practical point of view, with the free use of statistics. More readable than either of the foregoing works, in a literary sense, is Lieut. Schwatka's 'Military Reconnoissance in Alaska,' undertaken in 1883. It is illustrated with tolerable process cuts from photographs, and with numerous charts, and has much to relate of scenery and population from Chilkoot Inlet, Alaska, to Fort Selkirk, B. C. Only the native tribes visited are described, but these fully, according to instructions. The report is not long, the charts exceeding it in bulk. The Bureau of Navigation puts out No. 83, a pamphlet on 'The Use of Oil to Lessen the Dangerous Effect of Heavy Seas.' The evidence already accumulated is so strong that neglect to resort to this use, or to make regular provision for it, must be thought highly culpable.

'The Pilgrimage to Parnassus, with the two parts of the Return from Parnassus: Three Comedies performed in St. John's College, Cambridge, A. D. 1597-1601,' edited from MSS. by the Rev. W. D. Macray, M.A., F.S.A. (Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan), is a volume of especial interest to Shaksperian students, as well as to all students of the old drama. The third part has been several times published, but the text of this issue is more authentic, and the two opening parts are altogether fresh. The new passages in reference to Shakspere show once more his popularity, and especially the vogue of 'Venus and Adonis,' though the praise of "sweete Mr. Shakspeare" is put into the mouth of a pretender to knowledge. There is a good deal of interest in the notices of contemporary university life and of the "poor scholars'" condition in the world, as well as in some of the realistic low characters. It is a very noticeable and valuable addition to the illustrative literature of the time, and renews the hope that there are yet new finds to be made even in the well-worked field of Shakspere reference-books.

Though partaking of the nature of an advertisement, Mr. M. N. Forney's 'Locomotives and Locomotive Building' tells not only the history of the Rogers Works at Paterson, N. J., but of the development of the American engine out of and away from English models. It is very fully illustrated, even to "organic" details, and makes an interesting chapter in the annals of American inventiveness, industry, and enterprise.

The 'Public School French Reader,' published by Cassell & Co., is edited by M. Guillaume S. Conrad, French Master at Portsmouth Grammar School. It is quite elementary and well graded, and so abundantly provided with grammatical synopses and tables of all kinds that a pupil might begin the study of French without the use of any other book, especially as it has a complete vocabulary, with full grammatical and etymological notes. Words occurring for the first time are in large type, and all peculiarities of language are in italics. Everything seems done to make the text-book agreeable to the pupil, but instructors might be glad to know where the extracts are taken from; of this there is no indication.

'Le Livre: l'illustration—la reliure' is a short historical account of the development of the printed book. It is published in the "Bibliothèque de l'Enseignement des Beaux-Arts," and is by M. Henri Bouchot (Paris: Quantin; New York: Christern). The author, who is attached to the département des estampes of the Bibliothèque Nationale, says modestly that his work has no pretention to enlighten the learned, but addresses itself rather to an audience interested in the artistic aspects of the subject. For this purpose the decoration of books has been specially treated, and more particularly all that relates to the designers and engravers who have adorned them since the invention of printing. The numerous illustrations of the volume are taken from rare works, and generally seem to be those which have not been extensively reproduced. The narrow limits of a single volume, however, prevent any satisfactory presentation of the decorative arts as applied to books, for 'Le Livre' is a sketch of the subject extending over the whole period of more than four and a-half centuries since printed books have existed.

Bernard Quaritch, 15 Piccadilly, London, is extending his unsurpassed series of sale catalogues with 'Monuments of the Early Printers in All Countries.' Part i embraces books from Germany and the Low Countries; Part ii, those from Italy.

The Columbia Library School was opened in this city on January 5, with twenty pupils from without Columbia College, some coming from as remote points as San Francisco and Birmingham, England. New York City and State furnish seven, Massachusetts five, etc. Four-fifths are women. Three hours of direct instruction are given in the old library of Columbia College. The lectures cover a wide range of topics, e. g., "Character and Dialect in Fiction" (W. H. Bishop), "The South in the Past and in the Future" (E. S. Nadal), "Molière" (G. A. Scribner), "Egypt 2,000 Years Ago" (Mytton Maury), "The Poetry of Wordsworth" (T. M. Coan), "The Argument against Classical Study" (H. T. Peck), besides the special discourses on library economy, as, "A Library's Maximum of Usefulness," "As Regards Books," "As Regards Readers" (W. E. Foster).

After twenty years of persistent accumulation, the State Historical Society of Wisconsin has raised a binding fund of $20,000, whose income will now become available for the first time. The thirty-fourth annual report also states that the bound newspaper files in the Society's library number 4,942.

Special stress is laid on the collection of newspapers in the report of the librarian of the American Antiquarian Society at Worcester, Mass., printed in the new volume of Proceedings (vol. iv, Part 3). This society has a number of duplicate files ready for exchange. The pièce de résistance of these Proceedings is Dr. Charles Deane's minute inquiry into the history of slavery and the slave-trade in Massachusetts, provoked by the foolish remark of a North Carolina Senator in regard to the responsibility of Massachusetts for the introduction of slavery into this continent, as "the nursing mother of the horrors of the middle passage." In slave-trading it is notorious that Rhode Island easily led all New England.

Vol. 20 of the American Law Review (St. Louis: Review Publishing Co.) reaches us in an imperfect form. We trust that other copies of this work may not have a page torn out of them, and be otherwise defective, like the one which lies before us. This volume has various articles on codification, on both sides of the question, readable but not very important, although from eminent persons. The wretched compilations which some are seeking to impose upon the State of New York as codes of law do not get their full deserts of condemnation. Nor is the point sufficiently pressed against the codifiers, that the first thing to do is to understand our existing law far more thoroughly than we do at present. There are several articles of merit in this volume, e. g., on "Special Interrogations to Juries," "Warranties and Conditions in Sales," "Extradition," "The Treaty-making Power," and others; but we have not noticed any that equal several of those in the last volume.

The first numbers reach us of the Railway and Corporation Law Journal, published in this city. "The essential features of this journal," we are told, "will be the publication of the English and American corporation and railway cases. It will give either full or abbreviated reports of all railway and corporation decisions handed down after January 1, 1887." No doubt this will be useful, and it may be a successful venture. But we doubt the necessity for adding to the already over-numerous periodicals which clamor for the lawyer's money.

Prof. Shaler broaches, in the Harvard Monthly for February, a scheme of scholarships for post-graduate courses, the fund being in the keeping of Harvard, but the filling of the scholarships being left to a certain number of colleges which can be trusted to select worthy beneficiaries. No doubt he is right in speculating that this would tend to the greater frequenting of the colleges in question, and so effect missionary work in the cause of the higher education.

Walford's Antiquarian, published by George Redway, London, is enlarged for the year 1887, and is a handsome, well-printed octavo. The first article in the January number is an account of Domesday Book—historical and descriptive—with a cut representing the book itself and the chest in which it is kept. An article on "Madcap Harry" and Sir John Popham, by Charlotte G. Boger, undertakes to show that Chief-Justice Popham furnished, in his own pranks and escapades, the materials from which Shakspere made out his account of those of Prince Hal. An article entitled "Tom Corygate and his Crudities" contains some entertaining incidents from the European journey of Tom Corygate—a very rare book, published in 1611. In the February number a short article entitled "The Defence of England in the Sixteenth Century" embodies the results of an unprinted report made in the Napoleonic times—that England, against the Armada of 1588 vessels manned by 27,128 men, had a fleet of 195 vessels, with 15,334 men; of course the Spanish ships were much the most powerful. "A Forgotten Crom wellian Tomb" tells of the tomb of Anna, daughter of Richard Cromwell, and contains considerable interesting matter about her father. The articles in this periodical are mostly short and readable, and there are several good reviews of books and a large number of antiquarian items.

The last number of the St. Petersburg European Messenger, the leading Russian magazine, has an article by Gen. Przewalsky summarizing the results of his fourth journey in Central Asia, an account of which is soon to be published. The population, whose numbers he estimates at 9,000,000, inhabiting a tract of 120,000 square miles, four-fifths of which is desert, is divided into two classes, the nomads and the permanent dwellers on the oases at the foot of the mountains. While there are differences in race, religion, and manners, there is much in common with the Tanguts, Turcomans, Dongans, and Khirgiz. They are all characterized by extreme laziness and egoism, and are destitute of all ideas of honor, virtue, or duty. The immorality and the government of the sedentary people are far worse than those of the nomads. A large part of the article is taken up with Central Asian politics, the author asserting that the influence of Russia is greatly on the increase in these regions, except in Thibet. "I was able to convince myself, at every step of my last journey, that in all the cities and oases of Eastern Turkestan the inhabitants dream day and night of the better state of things which Russia will introduce." In closing, he advises a more energetic policy against Chinese intrigues.

Russia, which thus far has been free from the beyond-sea colonizing mania which has seized the other European Powers, seems to have been unable to resist the universal tendency. A Russian colony, numbering 1,800 persons, is ready to settle in New Guinea, provided the sanction of the Government can be obtained.

The London Graphic for January 29 has an illustrated article by Dr. Felkin on the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, with a fine portrait of Emin. The article itself is little more than a reproduction of a portion of his paper in the Scottish Geographical Magazine. It is hoped that Stanley will reach Emin by the middle of June. The blockade of the Sudan, which has now lasted for more than three years, is about to be raised, and commercial intercourse between Egypt and the upper Nile region will be renewed. Whether this measure will add to the dangers of Emin's position remains to be seen.

'Franz Lieber, ein Bürger zweier Welten. Von Dr. Hugo Preuss,' is the title of one of the most recent numbers of the "Sammlung gemeinverständlicher wissenschaftlicher Vorträge," edited by Rud. Virchow und Fr. von Holtzendorff (Hamburg: J. F. Richter, 1886). Dr. Preuss is an ardent admirer of Lieber. "The name of Francis Lieber," he says, "is of good repute in the literature of political science. He is esteemed by scholars as a profound and original thinker on this subject. But beyond the circle of workers in his special department he is as yet but little known among us in Germany; and yet his memory deserves to be cherished, not only in the annals of science, but likewise in the minds of his countrymen at large. . . . His mission in America was that of an envoy of German science. The political and social life with which he came in contact, as a citizen of the New World, he grasped and penetrated with the scientific and ethical spirit which, as a citizen of the Old World, he took with him over the ocean. . . . All his writings are illumined and warmed by lofty ideas of perfecting the human race and developing freedom. . . . Such a man belongs not merely to the people among whom he labored during his lifetime, but, above all, to the people who faithfully cherish the memory of his creative conceptions and the bright example of his noble life" (pp. 7–8). Dr. Preuss also quotes the words of Holtzendorff: "For me he (Lieber) marks the culmination of universal political knowledge (politischer Weltbildung), in which all the spiritual powers of ancient classical culture, Italian art, German science, English love of freedom, and American independence had coalesced into one harmonious whole" (p. 9). The author then gives a brief account of Lieber's life and works (pp. 9–44). The pamphlet will doubtless contribute very much toward making Lieber as well known and esteemed in the land of his birth as he is in his adopted fatherland.

With parts 4 and 5 is concluded the 'Kulturgeschichte des deutschen Volkes' composed by Dr. Otto Henne am Rhyn, and published by Grote in Berlin (New York: Westermann). When we consider the popular design and character of this work, and compare it with the "subscription books"—we mean the common run—foisted upon our own people, we can but be impressed with the difference in the appeals to literary taste and the love of beauty. Dr. Henne am Rhyn's 'History of German Civilization' is faultlessly printed, and most intelligently and bountifully illustrated, so that it is hardly too much to say that a purchaser ignorant of the language of the text would find entire satisfaction in the woodcuts, photographic facsimiles, and chromo-lithographs, which so vividly portray manners and customs, civic, military, and domestic life, famous cities and famous men. It is an education merely to study these pictorial accompaniments of a narrative penned by a learned scholar and antiquarian.

A parallel enterprise of the same eminent Berlin firm, the 'Allgemeine Weltgeschichte,' reaches the conclusion of its tenth volume in the 65th part, which, like its immediate predecessors, is wholly given up to the Napoleonic era. All our remarks above on the 'Kulturgeschichte' apply to this broader undertaking, the work of many authoritative hands. The illustrations deserve like praise, and are correspondingly plentiful.

'Argot and Slang,' a new French and English dictionary, by Prof. Barrère of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, is about to be issued by subscription as an édition de luxe. Each English rendering is followed by an English slang equivalent, and the work will possess a certain philological interest, not to say even readability. Its utility in reading modern French fiction is also urged in the prospectus before us.

— The number of books added to the Astor Library last year was 3,689, of which 2,720 were bought. The whole number of books, not including pamphlets, is now 225,179, making the Astor the fourth library in the country in the number of its volumes. In the character of its books it probably ranks well alongside the Harvard and the Boston Public. The Congressional Library, the only other that exceeds it in the number of its volumes, swells its list, as is well known, with a large number of works that increase its size rather than its worth. The number of books added to the Astor was considerably less than the annual increase of the four or five years preceding; but the library received many valuable accessions, and it still maintains its list of current periodicals, especially foreign, which is very large and important, but perhaps hardly as well known as it should be. Another volume of the new Astor Catalogue has been published within a few weeks, and this carries the work along through the letters E–K in 956 pages, and is consequently smaller than vol. i by 152 pages. The work maintains the same high character of the cataloguing, and the same elegant appearance of the page, that we noticed in the preceding volume. It is also executed on the same general principles; but we understand that the limit to the books included has been largely extended, so that, while no date later than 1880 is to appear in the work, it yet will include a large number of accessions received later than 1880. In this volume the entry "Great Britain" covers the greatest number of pages—more than twenty-nine. Next comes "Free Masons," with over seven. A few subject entries are printed under both these heads, and under the first they are mainly anonymous. Biographical works and works on American local history are treated pretty fully under the proper subject headings; but these entries, while a convenience and a foretaste of what a subject-catalogue would yield, serve mainly to emphasize the true nature of the catalogue, as expressed in the title, namely, that it is a catalogue of authors and books.

— It may be well here to correct an error which, in view of Mr. Little's statement in the preface to vol. i, it would hardly be necessary to correct had it proceeded from an inferior source. We refer to Mr. Vinton's essay on the Catalogue, which was read before the American Library Association last year at its Milwaukee meeting, and which was afterwards printed without correction in the Library Journal. In it he said that the present work is to include all the books in the Library. He then went on to specify a certain book as strangely wanting. But the preface to vol. i distinctly said that the Catalogue was a continuation of Dr. Cogswell's four-volume catalogue of 1857–61. The title-pages of the new work also bear the word "continuation." A reference to the old and not superseded catalogue would have shown that the Library owns the work said to be wanting. Mr. Vinton also said, in his somewhat curious notice, that the Catalogue "gives every book under the first word of the title." The Catalogue puts anonymous works under the first word of the title, not an article or preposition, but other titles are extremely rarely put under their first words. It will, moreover, be found to be the rarest exception, if such titles are not the titles of collectioas, which are likely to be as well known, or better known, by their first words than by the names of their editors. The present Catalogue is rapidly advancing to completion, and it is thought that the whole work will be in the hands of readers at the Library in considerably less than two years more.

—Mr. Otto Schroeder has some new ideas about language, which he publishes in the January number of the Preussische Jahrbücher. His thesis is that, in language, whatever is is right; that inconsistencies, irregularities, varieties, and other obstacles to uniformity are not evils to be deplored or borne with patience, but are intrinsically good. It is to be hoped that Mr. Schroeder will not visit the United States, for, in addition to the dreary uniformity noticed by Europeans in other fields, we might thereafter be held up as an instance of the bad effects of uniformity of language. France, again, has for centuries been pursuing a centralizing policy in this matter, and there are persons who think the French language more convenient, and expressive, and comprehensible than the German. Indeed, there are even Germans who wish to "improve" their language. But these are, for the most part, according to Mr. Schroeder, not real Germans, but merely dwellers in the northeastern provinces—that is, Germanized barbarians. Mr. Schroeder agrees with previous writers that there must be two varieties of language in any country, viz., the Volkssprache and the Schriftsprache; but he objects to these names, and proposes to substitute for the latter Litteratursprache. Long before the songs of Homer were written out, he remarks, their language was as different from that of the listeners, in different places, as it was afterwards. The same is true to-day of the peasants at the extremes of Germany—Rügen and the Black Forest—whose dialects are as different as possible, but whose songs are in a language they can neither write nor speak.

—Mr. Schroeder, of course, recognizes the fact that language is an organism, and hence constantly in the process of development; but he holds that all changes other than natural ones—that is, all that are not inevitable, unforeseen, and unintended—should be discouraged. The literary language, he thinks, is a very good thing, but the efforts of schoolmasters and others to make it coincident with spoken language are absurd. There is, however, something worse than the pedantry of the schoolmasters, and that is what he calls the "paper" style—i. e., a form of expression other than colloquial about every-day matters. It is a long way, indeed, from the literary to the paper style, but, when the road is well paved, progress is rapid, says the proverb, and the pavement is here the new orthography. Our critic is as kindly disposed towards differences in spelling as he is towards deviations from uniformity in grammatical construction and in phraseology—sees, in fact, no objection to everybody's spelling as he likes, provided it is sanctioned by local or traditional usage. The "paper" enthusiast would prefer phonetic spelling; not, however, for its own sake, but because so soon as he has convinced the world that it must spell phonetically, behold, the world finds itself without any guide except the existing written language, so that, instead of spelling as they pronounce, people will have to pronounce as they spell.

—In 1883 Mr. D. A. Rovinsky brought out what was pronounced to be one of the greatest artistic and scientific publications of Russia, on the subject of old woodcuts, entitled 'Russian Popular Pictures.' This placed in the hands of native and foreign investigators materials in the line of popular art such as had previously been nearly inaccessible. The price was high, but the book sold so fast that it is now almost impossible to obtain a copy. Mr. Rovinsky has followed this up with another work on Russian art, which has been in course of publication since 1882. It consists of three parts, an atlas of drawings, a volume of descriptive text, and one of studies, each of which, by itself, would have constituted a great service to art. It is planned on a very large scale, and contains portraits, views, historical and social plates, plates prepared for the history of Russian engraving, representations of silversmith gravers' work, and prints from other ancient and original plates. A few of the reproductions are in colors, including some in oil of the False Dimitri and Marina Mnishek. This publication is in the line of 'Monuments de la Monarchie Française [1729–1793],' 'Monuments Français Inédits [1806],' and 'Monumentos de la Monarquia Española,' all unfinished. People in Russia and elsewhere are accustomed to think that all ancient representations of the Russians were made by foreigners, but this impression is erroneous. The most ancient of all are fundamentally Russian, and Russian iconography dates from Svyatoslav's Collection, a manuscript of 1103, one of the most important, most artistic, and most original monuments of Russian antiquity. Engraving began in the sixteenth century, but for a hundred years it remained in the hands of foreigners, so far as the presentation of historical and social subjects was concerned. The Russians knew how to engrave, but devoted themselves exclusively to religious subjects, and from the appearance of the first printed book, the Moscow 'Apostles,' in 1564, to the end of the seventeenth century, their engravings showed only holy personages—bishops, apostles, King David, and so on—almost all the books printed being of a religious character. Such an iconographic gallery as Mr. Rovinsky's has never existed anywhere, up to the present time. In it the Russian people are depicted, now by their own countrymen, now by foreigners, in their most intimate aspects, with portraits, costumes, the hearts of cities and the interiors of dwellings; with the emperors and the army, intellectual leaders, friends and enemies, both great and small, and their historical and domestic doings, collected from all over Europe and Russia.

—Under the heading of "A New Departure in Oriental Literature," a brief summary has been given, in No. 1028, of a noteworthy tale translated from the Hindûstânî. We refer to an English version of the 'Taubatu n-nasûh,' executed by Mr. M. Kempson, late Director of Public Instruction in Northern India. The original work, as was observed, is admirably fitted to supersede, for initiation in a knowledge of Hindûstânî or Urdû, the text-books which have long been in ordinary use. Not to speak of their insipidity and impurity, the Hindûstânî has undergone an amazing development since the days in which those text-books were written. In fact, viewed linguistically, they are much as Dryden would be to a foreigner who wished to acquire an acquaintance with English for practical purposes. But the 'Taubatu n-nasûh,' when we designated the end which it might subserve, was available only in slovenly Indian lithography, and unaccompanied by those aids which a commencing student finds indispensable. Mr. Kempson has now brought it out in a handsome volume, and has attached to the text not only a vocabulary, but abundant miscellaneous annotations. He has acquitted himself of his task well, yet not so well as could be desired. One cannot but wish that he had spent more time over his editing, and had been at more pains regarding sundry minutiæ, such as diacritical marks and punctuation. As to terseness and finish of expression in his notes, too, he has hardly given himself sufficient trouble about them. However, be the shortcomings of his work what they may, it will prove eminently serviceable to the learner. That it stands highly recommended is evidenced by the fact that the English Civil-Service Commissioners have prescribed it to be read by selected candidates for the Indian Civil Service. The 'Taubatû-n-nasûh' is published by W. H. Allen & Co., London.

STEPHENS'S FRENCH REVOLUTION.

A History of the French Revolution. By H. Morse Stephens, Balliol College, Oxford. Vol. I. London: Rivingtons; New York: Scribners.

In Dr. Arnold's correspondence may be found a letter to Carlyle on the then newly published 'French Revolution.' Arnold, it is manifest, is carried off his feet by the genius of an author whose powers were for the first time revealed to the public. He dwells on the lifelike sketches with which the book abounds. He insists upon its wisdom, its poetry, and its insight. We have no doubt that Mr. Morse Stephens has received many letters of congratulation on the appearance of his 'History of the French Revolution'; we have no doubt that he has received much praise, and justly earned praise, for the first fruits of his labors. But it would greatly surprise us to find that any competent critic had written of Mr. Stephens's book in anything like the terms used by Dr. Arnold of Carlyle's masterpiece. Of dramatic power, of poetic genius, there is not a trace in Mr. Stephens's volume. His merits are real and noteworthy, but they are not the excellences, nor are his defects the faults, of Carlyle. It is of importance to state this plainly in the very forefront of any account of Mr. Stephens's work. Readers who go to his pages expecting to find a poem in prose, or a sermon for the times, based on the lessons of the French Revolution, will meet with nothing but disappointment. What they will find is a solid—a hostile reviewer might say a heavy—account of the results which may be obtained by careful study of the best and latest authorities on a great and perplexing crisis in the annals of Europe. They will find a work, not of imagination, but of information; a book which, if it does not charm, certainly instructs, and which, to an intelligent reader, will appear a treatise full both of importance and of interest.

The importance of Mr. Morse Stephens's work is twofold. The book is, in the first place, a summary of the immense additions to our knowledge of the French Revolution acquired during the last fifty years. The mere lapse of time has done something to place men and events in their right point of view. When Carlyle wrote, the Revolutionary storm was not over; neither Tories, Whigs, nor Radicals could look calmly at events which were near to the generation who witnessed the carrying of the great Reform Bill, and which, moreover, told in one way or another upon the political contests of the moment. Croker hated reform because he remembered the Revolution, and his detestation of revolutionists was intensified by the feeling that the French Revolution was the beginning of the movement which was, before his eyes, destroying the supremacy of the English Tories. Carlyle himself, when he wrote his 'French Revolution,' was in fact influenced by the enthusiasm of his day. His narrative was written with a purpose, and his real, though unconscious, aim was to prove that the spirit of the Revolution was the denunciation of cant and the destruction of shams. The sentiment of Carlyle is now nearly as dead as the sentiment of Croker. It is neither more nor less easy to tell the facts of the Revolution which sent Louis XVI. to the scaffold than to tell the history of the Great Rebellion which led to the death of Charles I.

Nor is it due only to the advantage of distance that we can see Louis XVI., Lafayette, Mirabeau, the Girondins, or the Jacobins in a light very different from the light in which they were regarded by the last generation. Our actual knowledge is immensely increased. The Revolution has been studied, and is being studied, with the most profound care by inquirers, each of whom investigates a different part of the drama, each of whom looks at it from different sides and with different prepossessions, and each of whom may base his conclusions upon different information. When we add to all this that the publication of memoirs, the revelation of diplomatic documents, the collection of large masses of facts bearing on the local incidents of the Revolutionary struggle, have given to modern writers on the Revolution materials for understanding its course which were inaccessible to Alison, Carlyle, Thiers, or Lamartine, it is hardly too much to say that the man who tells the tale of the fall of the French monarchy, and of the foundation and overthrow of the French Republic, has something like a new narrative to tell—or, if the story be not changed, he must rest it on new evidence. It is as placing before English readers this mass of new facts that Mr. Stephens's book deserves to be called important; but the work has, in the second place, a negative importance from its promising to give the deathblow to a whole mass of errors which have nearly transformed history into legend.

The source of these delusions, whatever be the form they take, is one and the same. It is the notion that the so-called French Revolution, which ought in reality to be considered a mere portion of the European Revolution, was an event quite unlike anything else to be found in the records of mankind; that the motives which governed leaders and people were not the motives which affect the course of ordinary life; and that the actors in the sanguinary drama of which the main scenes were exhibited in Paris, might be heroes or monsters, but were in any case giants of more than human mould. This radically false idea has begot a host of opposed, but in character similar, misconceptions. Hence has arisen the astounding Revolutionary legend. Jacobins whose policy was, in its stupidity no less than in its cruelty, the policy of savages, have been credited with high statesmanship. The rhetoric and the pedantry of the Girondins have passed for the highest form of political virtue. The victories of the republican armies have been painted, even by Carlyle, as miracles. Nor have the assailants of the Revolution escaped the disturbing effects of the Revolutionary atmosphere. Marie Antoinette has been credited with wisdom and insight; the nobility have been portrayed as men only too much influenced by sentiments of humanity; the ancien régime, which was hated by every one who knew it from experience, has been defended or extolled by writers who enjoy the benefits derived from the Revolution, and who fancy that evils of which we have now forgotten the existence, could not have been intolerable when they existed. If the delusions of revolutionists and of anti-revolutionists are ever to be dispelled, the work must be done by a writer such as Mr. Morse Stephens. His very defects are for this purpose an advantage. He is not carried away by the dramatic aspects of his subject; he feels as much interest in details as to the state of the French navy or the singular constitution of the French army, as in the taking of the Bastille or the flight to Varennes. Hence he constantly recalls to his readers that even a revolutionary struggle has, like everything else in the world, its prosaic side, and that the tumults at Paris constitute nothing like the whole of the great movement of which they were in reality little more than the outward sign.

Readers who acknowledge the importance of such a contribution to historical knowledge as Mr. Stephens's work, may perhaps be inclined to think that a book which destroys the legendary romance of the Revolution must be devoid of interest. But this notion is grounded on the mistaken fancy that history cannot be interesting unless it has the charm of a novel. To intelligent inquirers the interest of inquiries into the past consists in the addition which such inquiries make to knowledge of mankind. A reader must be either singularly stupid or singularly well informed who does not admit that his knowledge is increased by a perusal of Mr. Stephens's 'French Revolution,' and with regard to personages whose names we all mention glibly enough, but who to most of us are, after all, little better than names. How many persons, for instance, could really give anything like a definite account of Mounier, of Rabaut-Saint-Étienne, of Grégoire, or even, to speak plainly, of Lafayette? Yet each one of the celebrated men whom we have named, and a score more, were personages who in their time played (or seemed destined to play) no small part during the earlier stages of the Revolution, and about every one of them facts can be learned from Mr. Morse Stephens which are worth knowing. Nor in our judgment is it a small gain that our author fixes a student's attention upon the character and career of men who, like Mounier, did not ultimately exert a permanent influence on the course of French history. The heroes of the drama, Mirabeau, Danton, Robespierre, Napoleon, and a few more, are sure to engross enough attention. Their figures become so prominent that one is apt to think that their character, their virtues or faults, determine the fate of the French nation. A little reflection on the careers of men who, though they started well, did not attain anything like lasting fame, is a salutary corrective to the overestimate of the weight exerted by the genius of individuals.

Mounier is a typical example of our meaning. For a short time he was one of the most conspicuous among Frenchmen. He played a leading part in the affairs of Dauphiné, which formed a curious but now forgotten prelude to the great Revolutionary tragedy. He was, as it happened, acquainted with England, where he had learned to study and admire English institutions:

"He had carefully studied Blackstone and De Lolme, and looked upon the English Constitution as a whole without understanding that it had been the growth of centuries of compromise, and that it was in many points both more practical and less logical than his authorities stated. Confiding in his knowledge of political theories, Mounier had boldly taken the lead both at Vizille and at Romans, and had won the greatest political reputation in France; but the vanity of the man, and the incurable narrowness which always distinguishes a theoretical politician, prevented him from becoming a leader at Versailles."

This very commonplace statement of commonplace facts recalls what is in constant danger of being forgotten. At the commencement of the Revolution the men of weight were moderate constitutionalists; the nation aspired to the blessings of constitutional government. Could France have been polled, there almost certainly would have been a majority in favor of establishing a constitution like that of England. Nothing like the English Constitution was established, and mainly for two reasons. Frenchmen like Mounier saw English institutions through the utterly misleading light of theories propounded by Blackstone and De Lolme. The English polity was, further, in fact an aristocratic constitution masked under the forms of a monarchy. No scheme of government was more radically unsuitable for a people like the French, who did not in reality dislike monarchical authority, and who thoroughly detested aristocratic privilege. But the failures of French statesmanship will never be understood unless we bear in mind the very fact of which Mounier's career is a memorial, that the moderate reformers of France were as much misled by false views of the English Constitution as were Republicans by utterly ill-founded admiration for the institutions of Rome or of Sparta. It is difficult to say whether Blackstone or Plutarch were the worst guide to a Frenchman in search of the best of constitutions.

Mr. Stephens, again, throws fully as much light upon institutions as he does upon individuals. Nothing in his book is better than the account of the elections to the States-General. We all know in a vague manner that the convocation of the old French Assembly was a revival of an utterly forgotten institution; but we must study the matter in some detail before we can see how completely the existence and the nature of the States-General had passed out of human memory when, in an ill-fated moment, Louis XVI. attempted to revive an old institution in order that it might perform the new task of remodelling everything in France. If any man were to propose the restoration in England of the unreformed Parliament as it existed in 1800, or that the United States should resume the position of the American colonies before the War of Independence, he would be pronounced fit for Bedlam. Yet the proposal would be in one sense less wild than the scheme actually adopted by Necker. The nature of the unreformed Parliament can be ascertained (there are men still living who remember its existence), and that Parliament actually did govern Great Britain and Ireland. Any one who pleases can make out the relation which existed between England and her colonies till the American colonies revolted against the assertion of Parliamentary supremacy. But in 1788 no one in France really knew what had been the constitution of the States-General, and the States-General had never in reality been the permanent government of France. As you read Mr. Morse Stephens's first chapter, you see that it was the King and his Ministers who, in reality, set the example of substituting Utopias for really attainable political aims. The convocation of the States-General was, as it was conducted, the maddest of mad experiments, and, as one reads the details of the elections, any one can perceive that the first and fatal error of the King and his advisers was to let loose every element of discord and confusion while refusing to guide the Revolution at a time when the nation asked for nothing so much as for guidance. At the very moment when the necessities of the times demanded a strong government, and while the Crown was still popular, the army and the navy, the forces on which the Executive had to rely, were allowed to fall, in consequence partly of old abuses, and partly of rash reforms, into utter disorder. No single chapter of our author's work is better worth reading than the essay (for it is nothing less) on the French Army and Navy. It explains two or three things which must have often puzzled thoughtful students. It shows, for example, how it happened that the old army, while it did not save the Crown of the Bourbons, was nevertheless the body which supplied the great generals and conspicuous officers of the Republic and the Empire. It also brings to light a matter naturally overlooked by Englishmen, that the triumphs of Nelson and his companions were due, in part at least, to the mismanagement which had disintegrated the old navy of France.

One problem which, so to speak, sums up most of the speculative questions raised by the earlier stages of the Revolution, receives careful consideration from Mr. Morse Stephens. Had Mirabeau planned out a policy which, but for his death, might have saved the monarchy, or (what is, oddly enough, really the same thing) which might have saved the Revolution, from failure? Our author gives as near an answer to this inquiry as is possible. Mirabeau, it is certain, entered into definite relations with the Court. It is also certain that he received pecuniary payment for his services. We may further add to this that there is little reason for supposing that he sold his principles. He was bought, but he was not corrupted. He joined the Court, it would appear, with a view of carrying out what he held to be sound policy. He wished, as our author puts it, to restore order, but not to restore the old order of things. He had, moreover, a distinct policy, and a policy which, if it varied in form, preserved throughout the same essential characteristic. The King was to become the guide of the Revolution; he was, surrounded with force and dignity, to retreat openly from Paris. "Why should we fear civil war?" said Mirabeau. "Civil war—it will be the means of saving the King, who will be lost without hope if he continues to stop in Paris." His primary idea was an open appeal from Paris to the country. When he found that the Court had not the boldness to adopt his great scheme, he proposed a less daring but more subtle plan for discrediting the Assembly, and, by force of provincial opinion, compelling its dissolution. The King the leader of the country, and the country the supporter of the King against Paris—this, under different shapes, was Mirabeau's policy. Could it have succeeded?

When we ask this question we must, if we keep the facts brought out by Mr. Morse Stephens in view, keep distinct two different inquiries which are liable to be blended together. Could the Crown have been saved if the King would have been guided by Mirabeau as Victor Emanuel was guided by Cavour, or even to the extent in which, in 1783, George III. was guided by Pitt? As far as any matter which cannot be tested by experience admits of an answer, we believe it to be all but certain that our reply should be in the affirmative. The King was popular; monarchy was not hated by the French nation; the reforms for which the people really cared were exactly that class of reforms which might have increased rather than diminished the influence of the Crown. Louis XVI. might well, under the guidance of a statesman, have anticipated all that was permanent in Napoleonic institutions. Was Mirabeau's policy, as things stood—including under the term "things" the character of the King and of the Queen—a policy which had a fair chance of success? We hold, and we take it that Mr. Morse Stephens holds with us, that this inquiry must be met with an unhesitating negative. Neither King nor Queen would trust the one man capable of aiding them. The childish romance that Mirabeau was captivated by Marie Antoinette rests on no basis. The idea that a singularly unwise woman, who never, throughout her career, recognized greatness of any sort, perceived the genius of Mirabeau and was willing to give him her confidence, is, it would seem, demonstrably untrue. His specific plans, moreover, assumed that the provinces could be played off against Paris. The assumption was not unnatural, and the later history of France since 1848 certainly shows that when once the country, as represented by the Government, can be rallied against the capital, the capital may be forced to give way. But it is in the highest degree doubtful whether, even under the leadership of Mirabeau, the provinces would have resisted the supremacy of Paris. No party throughout the great Revolution which relied on provincial support escaped ruin. The Girondins were the country party, and the Girondins were destroyed by the Mountain. The Jacobins fell, not because the provinces rose against their tyranny, but because the Terrorists were divided, and Paris at last supported the Convention against Robespierre. The later annals of the Revolution, the much neglected history of the Directorate, lead, unless we are mistaken, to the same conclusion—that, towards the end of the last century, the party or man who was victorious in Paris became of necessity the ruler of France.

The examination into the later phases of the Revolutionary struggle will, we venture to predict, exhibit in a specially favorable light Mr. Morse Stephens's historical powers. Meanwhile we are glad to express our high appreciation of a work which will, when completed, form such a manual of the history of the Revolution as does not at present exist in the English language. Mignet has supplied something like it for Frenchmen, but Mignet's work was written many years ago, and was therefore not based upon our present large store of information about the Revolution.

THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS.

A Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria. From 1852 to 1860. By the late Charles C. F. Greville, Esq., Clerk of the Council. 2 vols. London: Longmans, Green & Co.; New York: Worthington Co. 1887. Also, in one volume. D. Appleton & Co.

It is impossible to resist a feeling of melancholy as one lays down these volumes. Never was the author of a journal more unobtrusive of his own personality, or more successful in winning the regard of his readers. As we draw toward its close we are oppressed with foreboding; we note with pain the signs of increasing age and depression, the longer and more frequent breaks in the narrative, the gradual withdrawal of the author from the world in which he had so long played a considerable though silent part. When he finally takes leave of us, his parting words are full of gloom: he declares that he closes his record "with a full consciousness of the smallness of its value or interest, and with great regret that I did not make better use of the opportunities I have had of recording something more worth reading."

This third part of the Memoirs adds little to our knowledge of history. It covers a period in which great events occurred—the war of the Crimea, the Indian Mutiny, and the Italian war—but it does not tell us much that is new. As history it even fails to be interesting. We have an accurate reflection of diplomatic life—the listening to contradictory reports derived from equally trustworthy or untrustworthy sources, the bickering, the indecision, the vacillation and the deceit of ministers, and the possible and probable views of sovereigns. All this is very agreeably told, and many side-lights are thrown upon the details of the political history of Europe during the era of Napoleon III.; but these details are, for the most part, unimportant. In spite of the opportunities for obtaining information possessed by Greville, he seems to have known little more than the newspapers. He is constantly changing his opinion about the possibilities of peace or war and the disposition of this potentate and that ambassador, and he is repeatedly obliged to abandon his most carefully formed judgments. To listen to him is like watching the shadow and sunshine of an April day. We may form an infinity of speculations as to what the weather will be, but they will most of them be wrong, and it will not be of much consequence if they are.

So far as English political history is concerned, or rather the secret history of the cabinets of the day, their making and unmaking, Greville is at least upon his own ground. But his view is a narrow one. He apparently has no clearly defined political principles, and his judgments are based almost entirely upon personal considerations. From his revelations we are led to think better than before of Aberdeen and worse of John Russell. He did not like Palmerston, and often speaks of him with great severity; but he shows and admits that a man of inferior character may have the great political merit of availability. Further than this we do not observe that he furnishes us much information that cannot be obtained from other sources, nor does he contribute much in the way of anecdote for our entertainment. We may therefore concur with the author in his estimate of the value of his work considered as a chronicle, and even join in his condemnation of his own negligence in the use of his rare opportunities. But these are matters of less consequence than he supposed; for while he is trying to tell us about the men and events of his day, we are thinking of him—watching his manner, learning his principles of judgment, and analyzing his mental and moral constitution. Had he anticipated this he would not have written, or, if he had, what he wrote would have lost its value. Modesty would have restrained him or self-consciousness would have ruined his work. But he had no such anticipation; we learn incidentally that he had the gout and went to all the horse races, but the details of his personal life he never dwells upon.

In illustration of his aristocratic temperament we may quote his remarks upon the death of Lord Beauvale; and we may observe, by the way, that these obituary notices of those whom he had known are of a very high order. There is nothing labored about them—the thoughts seem to have been written down as they came into the mind of the author; yet their literary form is elegant, and they remind us of those characterizations with which the great historians of classic times were pleased to adorn their pages. They constitute, in fact, the most meritorious portion of the book. Of Lord Beauvale (Frederick Lamb) he says:

"He was not so remarkable a man in character as his brother William, less peculiar and eccentric, more like other people, with much less of literary acquirement, less caustic humor and pungent wit; but he had a vigorous understanding, great quickness, a good deal of general information; he was likewise well versed in business and public affairs, and a very sensible and intelligent converser and correspondent. He took a deep and lively interest in politics to the last moment of his life, was insatiably curious about all that was going on, and was much confided in and consulted by many people of very different parties and opinions. He never was in Parliament, but engaged all his life in a diplomatic career, for which he was very well fitted, having been extremely handsome in his youth, and always very clever, agreeable, and adroit. He consequently ran it with great success, and was in high estimation at Vienna, where his brother-in-law, Palmerston, sent him as Ambassador. He was always much addicted to gallantry, and had endless liaisons with women, most of whom continued to be his friends long after they had ceased to be his mistresses, much to the credit of all parties. After having led a very free and dissolute life, he had the good fortune at sixty years of age, and with a broken and enfeebled constitution, to settle (as it is called) by marrying a charming girl of twenty, the daughter of the Prussian Minister at Vienna, Count Maltzahn. This Adine, who was content to unite her May to his December, was to him a perfect angel, devoting her youthful energies to sustain and cheer his valetudinarian existence with a cheerful unselfishness, which he repaid by a grateful and tender affection, having an air at once marital and paternal. . . .

"He nominally belonged to the Liberal party, but in reality he was strongly Conservative, and he always dreaded the progress of democracy, though less disturbed than he would otherwise have been by reflecting that no material alteration could possibly overtake him. His most intimate friends abroad were the Metternichs and Madame de Lieven, and his notions of foreign policy were extremely congenial to theirs. Here, his connections all lying with people of the Liberal side, he had nothing to do with the Tories, for most of whom he entertained great contempt. Brougham, Ellice, and myself were the men he was most intimate with. . . .

"He was largely endowed with social merits and virtues, without having or affecting any claim to those of a higher or moral character. I have no doubt he was much more amiable as an old man than he had ever been when he was a young one; and though the death of one so retired from the world can make little or no sensation in it, except as being the last of a remarkable family, he will be sincerely regretted, and his loss will be sensibly felt by the few who enjoyed the intimacy of his declining years."

It is hard to say which is the more striking—the intimacy between the Liberal ambassador and Metternich, the Conservative feeling and contempt for the Tories, the friendships so "much to the credit of all parties," the absence of all virtues of a "moral character," the sincere regret of Greville, or the passionate grief of the young wife, who, after devoting ten years of her life to nursing an old roué deprived of the use of his limbs by his own excesses, hopes to be relieved of the remainder of it "that she may (as she believes and expects) be enabled to join him in some other world." We cannot imagine any other world than this in which Lord Beauvale would be happy; but there is obviously nothing incongruous to Greville in the picture that he has drawn. It was taken from life—from the life that he was accustomed to and saw nothing strange in; and in his description of his friend he has revealed himself.

We would by no means give the impression that Greville was incapable of appreciating "merits and virtues of a moral character." His beautiful tribute to Lord Ellesmere would not have been out of place in a funeral sermon, and much of his comment upon men and measures shows that he admired high aims and principles. But he was unable to look beyond the boundaries of his aristocratical world. He would have been well enough pleased, apparently, had the political arrangements of the Congress of Vienna remained unchanged. As he grew old, his dread of "progress," by which he understood the advance of democracy, increased, and he was annoyed that the oppressions of the Neapolitan despot should have received the official notice of other governments. So little sympathy had he with the longings of the Italian patriots for unity and freedom, that he regarded the establishment of the kingdom of Italy as a positive scandal. Yet in his day he had seen the necessity of reform in England.

We should be glad to quote his account of the life of Mme. de Lieven, but we can here only refer to it. Very pleasant in tone is what he has to say of Macaulay, and upon some points we should follow his judgment implicitly. He was above all a well-bred man, as well as a man of culture, and when he tells us that Macaulay was a thoroughly delightful and agreeable talker, we feel sure that those who have described him as an offensive and selfish monopolist have not been free from envy. What Greville says elsewhere of Rogers bears us out in this; but for our own part we are content to accept the opinion of a man whose discrimination in such matters was so highly cultivated as to have become instinctive. We quote a portion of his remarks upon this point:

"Nothing was more remarkable in Macaulay than the natural way in which he talked, never for the sake of display or to manifest his superior powers and knowledge. On the contrary, he was free from any assumption of superiority over others, and seemed to be impressed with the notion that those he conversed with knew as much as himself, and he was always quite as ready to listen as to talk. 'Don't you remember?' he was in the habit of saying when he quoted some book or alluded to some fact, to listeners who could not remember, because, in nineteen cases out of twenty, they had never known or heard of whatever it was he alluded to. I do not believe anybody ever left his society with any feeling of mortification, except that which an involuntary comparison between his knowledge and their own ignorance could not fail to engender."

We should be glad to quote further from this comment upon Macaulay—the estimate of his merits as an historian seems to us especially just—but our space does not permit. There is no end to the quotable passages in a book like this, and if the reader does not at once come upon what he wants, he has only to refer to the copious index at the end. It is easy to see where Greville's sympathies must have lain during our civil war, and we are undoubtedly spared some disagreeable reading by his discontinuing his journal in 1860. Nevertheless, we heartily regret that he stopped where he did. He could have shown us a side of things that we are not likely now to see, nor, at this interval of time, would his sentiments have been able to wound us.

RECENT LAW BOOKS.

An important and very valuable recent publication of the United States Government is the three volumes, entitled 'A Digest of the International Law of the United States, taken from Documents issued by Presidents and Secretaries of State and from Decisions of Federal Courts and Opinions of Attorneys-General.' It is printed in accordance with a resolution of Congress of July 24 last, "under the editorial supervision of Francis Wharton." This digest had been already prepared by Dr. Wharton when this resolution was passed; and it is now published with his name on the back and on the title-page. Dr. Wharton is well known as a legal author, and his former books have been marked by a peculiar neatness of appearance. But these volumes, from the Government press, look like a set of their poor relations. The editor must be a little chagrined, one would think, to come out in the squalid, inferior, job-lot dress (if one may so express it) that stamps what comes from the "Government Printing-Office." Dr. Wharton, however, is an official in the State Department, and it is in this character that he is now appearing. In substance these books are most useful; they must have cost the editor much labor. Dr. Wharton's industry and tact, and quick eye for what is interesting as well as serviceable, have stood him here in good stead. The volumes are mainly taken up with quotations from our state papers. Passages from other works are given, and many references to judicial decisions, with occasional extracts from them:

"In seeking for material I have turned every page of the volumes of records in the Department to which I have referred; and I have consulted in connection with them the various publications to be found in the annexed table. From these standards I have copied whatever in the way of principle bears on international law; and the extracts I have thus made I have arranged in the form of a digest, placing them chronologically under their respective heads. Of the materials that apply, in the way of principle, to the task before me, I believe I have omitted no passages giving the deliberate opinions of Secretaries from the beginning of the Government to the present day."

It would, of course, be idle to call the claims, speculations, and declarations, more or less conflicting, more or less judicious, of our high political officials, by the name of "law," even as that term is understood when "we speak of international law," and, therefore, the title of this compilation is in a degree misleading. The position of our Government, for example, as regards the Cutting case, is fairly open to question. The book, then, is in the main a digest of the interpretations of international law found in our archives. It is divided into twenty-three chapters, and deals with such topics as "Intervention with Foreign Sovereignties," "Citizenship, Naturalization, and Alienage," "Extradition," "War," "Piracy and Privateering," and many more. Statesmen, students, and lawyers will find the book an invaluable aid.

Dr. Wharton in various places expresses a doubt whether the children of Chinese born in this country are citizens under the Fourteenth Amendment; and controverts the statement of Calvo that they are. But he gives scant reasons in support of his view, and appears to have overlooked the case of Look Tin Sing, 10 Sawyer, 353 (1884), in which it was held in the Circuit Court of the United States (Mr. Justice Field of the Supreme Court giving the opinion) that such Chinese are citizens. To say, as Dr. Wharton does (§ 197), that "Chinese . . . are not capable of naturalization under our system," is inaccurate, or, at least, very misleading. Does anybody suppose that if Congress were to repeal to-morrow that part of its present law which excludes the Chinese from naturalization, there is anything in "our system" to prevent it? And as to the children of Chinese, born here, why are they not as much "within our jurisdiction" as an Englishman's children born here? Certainly no statute of Congress, in excluding their parents from naturalization, can cut down the operation of the Constitution upon the children. It would be an interesting question whether the children of tribal Indians, born off a reservation and within one of our States, are not citizens of the United States. The editor has not cited the important Indian case of United States v. Kagama, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in May last (118 U. S., 375). The value of his useful volumes is seriously lessened by the want of an index of cases.

Mr. J. K. Kinney's 'Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States from the Organization of the Court to the Close of the October Term, 1884,' in two volumes (Little, Brown & Co.), is an excellent performance. The notes are carefully prepared and are unusually exact and accurate. An examination of several of them and of the author's method of subdividing the titles and of his cross references leads to the opinion that we have here the work of a good and accurate lawyer, and that his preface is true in saying that "no labor has been spared where it has seemed that labor would add materially to the value of the work, in either matter or arrangement."

'A Treatise on the Limitations of the Police Power in the United States, considered both from a Civil and Criminal Standpoint'—such is the title of a portly octavo (St. Louis: The F. H. Thomas Law Book Co.) by Prof. C. G. Tiedman of the University of Missouri at Columbia. It relates to an interesting, but vaguely defined, topic in constitutional law—the limits upon the legislatures as regards the police power which are fixed, in terms or by just implications, in our written constitutions. The author, like the good judge in the proverb, amplifies his jurisdiction, and takes occasion to discuss at large such topics as the right of eminent domain and the legal-tender laws. He dissents from the decision in the case of Juilliard v. Greenman, but not, as it seems to us, with any marked strength of argument or in a manner to indicate any minuteness of research. The doctrine of Munn v. Illinois, the elevator case, is condemned; and, indeed, the author writes with a certain missionary purpose to discourage that sort of decision and encourage the contrary:

"The principal object of the present work is to demonstrate . . . that, under the written constitutions, Federal and State, democratic absolutism is impossible in this country, as long as the popular reverence for the constitutions, in their restrictions upon governmental activity, is nourished and sustained by a prompt avoidance by the courts of any violations of their provisions in word or spirit. . . . If the author succeeds in any measure in his attempt to awaken the public mind to a full appreciation of the power of constitutional limitations to protect private rights against the radical experimentations of social reformers, he will feel that he has been amply requited for his labors in the causes of social order and personal liberty."

Mr. Tiedman's book is a useful one for the practising lawyer. He has stated the law and collected the authorities on a large variety of topics. But he has omitted to consider duly one matter of fundamental importance, as regards the purpose that he has stated in the passages above quoted; and that is, the grounds, nature, and just scope of the judicial power to declare a legislative act void. There is much reason to think that missionary work is more needed in the direction of toning up our people and their legislative representatives to a recognition of the merely moral restraints which the constitutions impose upon them, than in spurring on the judges to a sterner exercise of their power of annulling legislative acts. At any rate, in undertaking the last office, it is highly important to analyze carefully the nature of this important function and to point out its just limits. We commend this matter to Prof. Tiedman's attention against the appearance of a second edition of his book.

A new edition of Pomeroy's 'Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States, especially designed for Students, General and Professional' (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), is now published—revised and enlarged by Edmund H. Bennett. The editor seems to have added something like a hundred pages to the text of the book as left by the lamented author in his last edition of it; and he has given in an appendix of about eighteen pages abstracts of the latest cases in the national courts. The work of the editor consists mainly in a modest statement of the results of the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the incorporation into the body of the work of some matter placed by Pomeroy in an appendix. This has been done in a judicious way. We welcome a new edition of one of the most valuable, intelligent, and original treatises on the Constitutional Law of the general Government which we have.

In Prof. Hare's 'Law of Contracts' (Little, Brown & Co.) we have an important contribution to a subject which has already received in recent years the attention of the keenest and most accomplished legal scholars. It illustrates the very great benefit which trained and learned legal students have it in their power to confer upon their profession. An eminent English lawyer said recently: "One of the many difficulties which stand in the way of improving the law of England—perhaps I might say the great difficulty—may be thus expressed: Those who have acquainted themselves with its provisions have generally neither the time nor the inclination to undertake any other task than that of administering it as an existing system. . . . On the other hand, those who have not a professional acquaintance with law are almost certain to be baffled in any attempt which they may make to improve it, by their ignorance of the subject." Prof. Hare belongs to a class of persons who are "learned in the law" in something more than that cheap and merely complimentary sense with which we are so familiar, and whose time and strength are not mainly absorbed in the work of practice and administration. Such men owe their profession a debt which nobody else can discharge.

The present work is worthy of Prof. Hare's reputation and of the high office which he, and men like him, hold in the field of legal authorship. About a hundred pages at the beginning of the book are given to a lucid statement of the development and peculiarities of the Roman procedure and the Roman law of contract. Then follow a statement of the development of the early English law, and a comparison of the two systems, which are of very great interest and value. Chapters are added on "Consideration," "Unilateral and Bilateral Contracts," "Performance," "Dependent and Independent Promises," and other subjects. The last half of the book is, in great part, a treatise on the law of sales of personal property, "being a practical and important application," says the author, "of the principles of both [the Roman and English] systems." Students of the law of contract, and practitioners who would fix in their minds clear and solid conceptions, will find this excellent volume no less interesting than it is instructive. At p. 178 the opinion in McCulloch v. The Eagle Ins. Co. is attributed to Chief-Justice Shaw—an inadvertence; Judge Shaw was not yet on the bench. At p. 414 and elsewhere the author falls into a very common error in stating the doctrine of Crofoot v. Bennett. It is none the less clearly an error because eminent persons have made it before.

A second edition has appeared of Mr. George H. Smith's 'Elements of Right and of the Law' (Chicago: Callaghan & Co.). It is but a few months since we noticed the first edition of this interesting book. The rapid disappearance of that edition is accounted for in a brief note of the editor, who remarks that "nearly the whole" of it was destroyed by the burning of the premises of his former publishers. He has taken the opportunity "to thoroughly revise the work, and to add some authorities to those originally cited." And we are glad to observe that he has also now given an index of cases, although in a somewhat eccentric form, viz., as a part of the general index under the letter A—"Authors and Cases Cited."

In the fourth edition of Mr. Melville M. Bigelow's well-known treatise on the 'Law of Estoppel' (Little, Brown & Co.) there are several important additions. "The chief features," he says, ". . . consist (1) in a more clear and exact marking of the limits of the subject in various places, and (2) a filling out to the limits wherever there was found vacant territory. . . . A particular example of the latter work may be seen in the new section 7 (on Waiver) of the chapter on Estoppel by Conduct (pp. 633–641); one of the former, in the consideration of judgments in rem, in chapters ii, iv, and v." As regards the subject last named, the author makes a careful analysis of judgments in rem, and incorporates the sensible limitations to the doctrine of the conclusive effect of such judgments, as it is ordinarily stated, that are pointed out in one or two recent cases, especially the case of De Mora v. Concha, 29 Ch. D. 268, in 1885, and that of Brigham v. Fayerweather, 140 Mass. 411. The chapter on Waiver is instructive, and should be read in connection with two valuable new pages (446-448), discriminating this and other matters, often called estoppel, from that which is strictly so called. It is to be hoped that Mr. Bigelow will work out these closely connected but in strictness, perhaps, outlying parts of the subject still more carefully. There is no part of the law which is more interesting to-day than this cloudy country of estoppel. This and parts of the law of evidence have long been the favorite hunting-grounds of judicial legislation. Estoppel is a very difficult topic to handle, because of the ambiguity of the phrase, and because the law in all departments is so largely developing under cover of this word. The profession owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Bigelow for his useful labors upon this very important subject. But much still remains to be done.

In Mr. F. F. Heard's 'Precedents of Pleadings in Personal Actions in the Superior Courts of Common Law' (Little, Brown & Co.), we have a work which might at first sight seem to be of only local use. The changes in the rules of pleading have been great in recent years, and different rules exist in different States; but, as the author remarks, "the effect . . . has not been to destroy the system or to change its essential principles." The forms appear to be brief and good. An introduction and notes, with extensive citations, add to the value of the book. Mr. Heard is a veteran at this sort of work.

The fifth edition of Washburn on 'Real Property,' edited by Joseph Willard and Simon Greenleaf Croswell (Little, Brown & Co.), is the first one that has lacked the benefit of its author's laborious and conscientious care in the preparation of it. It appears, however, under names which give assurance that competent learning, as well as acute and careful study, have been applied to the work of editing. This is as it should be in the case of a book so valuable and so widely used. We are told by the editors that much work has been done in condensing as well as in adding, and that they have mainly confined their additions to the notes. In number of pages the body of this edition has about a hundred and fifty pages more than the last one published in 1876. The table of cases has twenty-four pages more, in double columns, indicating an addition of, say, twenty-eight hundred cases.

'Ohio Corporations' (Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co.) is the second edition of a book very useful, one would think, to lawyers of that State, prepared—with notes of decisions and forms for organizing and managing corporations—by Messrs. A. T. Brewer and G. A. Laubscher of the Cleveland bar. The extent to which corporations are resorted to in our days, and the importance of the law relating to them, are very strikingly illustrated by what is said in the introduction to the first edition of this book, published in 1884:

"Under Ohio statutes corporations may now be formed for any purpose for which individuals may lawfully associate themselves, except for dealing in real estate or carrying on professional business. The extent to which Ohio people avail themselves of corporate rights may be judged by the fact that in the year 1883 alone 1,334 companies were formed, with authorized capital of $209,000,000. . . . Corporations of various kinds are now (1884) being formed at the rate of at least four for every working day in the year."

'The Road and the Roadside' (Little, Brown & Co.), by Burton Willis Potter, is a small book of a little more than a hundred pages. About half the book is taken up with an attempt to state in a familiar way the Massachusetts law relating to the principal topics connected with roads. The other parts of this little treatise are of the nature of essays on "location," "repairs," etc., of no striking value. Of the law chapters the writer says that they "were written and read as a lecture at the County Meeting of the Massachusetts Board of Agriculture in December, 1885, . . . and have since been published in the Report on the Agriculture of Massachusetts for the Year 1885." The author was hardly well advised in reprinting them in a separate book.

'Railway Accident Law: The Liability of Railways for Injuries to the Person,' by Christopher Stuart Patterson of the Philadelphia bar (Philadelphia: T. & J. W. Johnson & Co.), is a good, useful, and, in the main, a carefully prepared book. A lawyer, a judge, or a corporation who has a case of the sort to which the book relates, will find here the result of an intelligent examination of many cases, by a writer of discrimination and independent judgment. The chapters, however, which relate to evidence and presumptions are thin and poor.

Mr. W. P. Preble, jr.'s 'Collisions in United States Waters' (Little, Brown & Co.) is a small book in two parts, containing, first, "a list of the cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States involving maritime collisions"; and, second, "an alphabetical synopsis of the points of law and of fact decided, referring to the cases in the first list." It is arranged upon a somewhat novel plan. In the list of cases there is a compact statement of the facts of each case. In the other table the author endeavors, with almost superfluous pains, to guide the reader to whatever he may be searching for. Under the head of "Locality," e. g., the place of each collision is given; and so under those of "Time" and "Nature of Collision" the cases are again tabulated. It seems to be a carefully prepared and useful book.

We can heartily praise the 'Historical Introduction to the Private Law of Rome,' by Dr. Muirhead, Professor of Roman Law in the University of Edinburgh (Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black). It is a handsome octavo of something under four hundred and fifty pages, of which the writer says that "the following pages were written originally for the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' but had to be very much abridged in order to bring them within the limits of space the editor could afford to devote to their subject. He did me the honor to express the opinion that their publication in extenso would prove of service to various classes of readers. . . . This book is the result." It has every mark of embodying the results of the latest learning upon the subject. In point of interest and of a clear presentation of the topic, such as to meet the wants of the general student and, in particular, of careful students of our own law, we have met no book in our language so satisfactory as this. It is divided into five parts, dealing with the Regal Period; the Jus Civile, from the establishment of the Republic till the subjugation of central and southern Italy; the Jus Gentium and Jus Honorarium—in the latter half of the Republic; the Jus Naturale and Maturity of Roman Jurisprudence—under the Empire, until the time of Diocletian; and the Period of Codification—from Diocletian to Justinian.

In regard to the famous passage in the Twelve Tables which appears to purport a right on the part of creditors to cut up the body of a debtor, Dr. Muirhead has an interesting discussion. He thinks, as others have thought, the notion of a literal division of the body among the creditors to be wholly inadmissible, notwithstanding the consent of antiquity in that interpretation. The word secare may well enough mean distribute, as in the phrases bonorum sector and sectio personæ, meaning the distribution of an estate.

"On consideration of the whole matter," says the author, "the explanation that most commends itself to me is this—that where there was but one creditor concerned, and the two months of provisional detention expired without payment, intervention of a vindex, or compromise of some sort, the debtor definitively became his creditor's free bondman in virtue of the magisterial addictio; but that where co-heirs were concerned, as bondage and service to all of them would have been inconvenient, if not impossible, when they were not to continue to possess the inheritance in common, the debtor was sent over Tiber and sold as a slave, and the price got for him divided amongst them. If one or other got more than his fair share, no harm was done; for the disproportion would eventually be redressed in an action of partition."

To bring about this reading, some heroic treatment of the text is necessary, which we will not stop to explain.

Retrospections of America. 1797–1811. By John Bernard. Edited from the Manuscript by Mrs. Bayle Bernard, with an Introduction, Notes, and Index by Laurence Hutton and Brander Matthews. Illustrated. Harper & Bros. 1887.

JOHN BERNARD'S earlier recollections, which included only his experience in his own land, were edited from his papers many years ago, by his son, and this volume of his American life is made up mainly of extracts from the same originals, also prepared by his son, and now edited by the latter's widow. It covers only a portion of Bernard's career in this country, where he met with much popularity and success; but, owing to the long and frequent migrations of the theatrical profession in those days, the narrative for these few years includes life along our whole seaboard and in Canada. Mr. Bernard not only made his autobiography a record of his own doings and observations, but he used it apparently as a receptacle to empty his memory into, without much regard to whether his facts and stories were first or second-hand. Consequently one meets with a number of venerable jokes and well-worn anecdotes of the Revolutionary and Constitutional period, and some of an older date. He mingled in good society, and therefore had opportunity to learn something of our distinguished men and of the tone of the wealthier class, while he had a quick and humorous eye for the life of the country people. He is apt to leave narrative for dialogue, and he heightens and colors his "characters" in a theatrical manner; but the description he gives of the people and their ways is lively and realistic, and the satire is of the sort to be readily excused. The planters of the South owe him no thanks for the account he gives of them, but the Yankee peddler and the New York merchant are equally luckless; he discriminates well enough between the native bent of the various parts of the country, and is able to give their due to the Virginian and South Carolinian and the New Englander, while his general temper towards all the Americans is open and one of hearty good-liking. He spent a considerable part of the time covered by this volume in Boston, in the management of the Federal Street Theatre, but unfortunately in the years of the Embargo, and consequently of no profits, though elsewhere in the country, he says, the theatres made money. His sketches of the players and their peculiarities are very telling, and give us a good deal of information. Of manners he offers, indeed, a few illustrations, but not much that is of great novelty; his forte as a humorist interferes with his exactness as an observer, and he is perpetually on the edge of caricature and often transgresses. This makes his book more readable, and he has spiced it well with adventure and anecdote.

He had one notable encounter with Washington near Mt. Vernon. The two assisted in righting a vehicle that had met with an accident, and, after some little time of such fellowship in action, Washington recognized the actor, introduced himself, and invited Bernard to his house to rest a while. The account of the interview of an hour and a half is very interesting, both for the closeness and exactness of Bernard's observation, and for the "feeling of awe and veneration" which, he says, irresistibly stole over him. Two remarks of Washington are noticeable. "When I mentioned to him," says Bernard, "the difference I perceived between the inhabitants of New England and of the Southern States, he remarked, 'I esteem those people greatly; they are the stamina of the Union, and its greatest benefactors. They are continually spreading themselves, too, to settle and enlighten less favored quarters. Dr. Franklin is a New Englander.'" The second relates to the abolition of slavery—"'an event, sir, which, you may believe me, no man desires more heartily than I do. Not only do I pray for it on the score of human dignity, but I can clearly foresee that nothing but the rooting out of slavery can perpetuate the existence of our Union, by consolidating it in a common bond of principle.'"

The notes by Messrs. Hutton and Matthews are very slight, and the introduction is merely a brief, business-like preface, containing the dates of Bernard's life (he returned to England in 1819 and died in 1828), and the facts with regard to the manuscript and the previous publication of parts of this volume in periodicals some years ago. The work is really a valuable illustration of our early theatre, as well as thoroughly entertaining.

Talks with Socrates about Life. Translations from the 'Gorgias' and the 'Republic' of Plato. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1886.

BEING asked his opinion about the institution of a thorough course of English studies in the universities of England, Mr. Bright, whose own English notoriously owes nothing directly, though it owes very much indirectly, to the study of the ancient classics, is bold enough to say, in a recent number of the Pall Mall Gazette, that when reading Plato in Dr. Jowett's translation he was stirred to greater admiration of Dr. Jowett than of Plato. "I have been more astonished," he says, "at the wonderful capacity and industry of the Master of Balliol than at the wisdom of the great philosopher of Greece." Those who know Greek are not all of the same opinion with Mr. Bright, and, in spite of its manifold excellences, Dr. Jowett's translation does not satisfy every mind, assuredly not the mind of the author of the volume entitled 'Talks with Socrates about Life,' which is really a new rendering of a large part of the 'Gorgias' and the opening of the seventh Book of the 'Republic,' and proceeds from the same hand to which we owe the companion volumes, 'Socrates' and 'A Day in Athens with Socrates.' The plan is the same, the execution the same. The translator is evidently under the stress of a mission, and honestly believes with many of us that Plato has yet some work to do for them that are without.

About a third of the 'Gorgias,' if we may trust a rough count, is given in abstract, the rest in an easy, graceful rendering, which shows close study and refined instinct. Dr. Jowett's way of making short cuts is not followed, but, to relieve what many moderns consider the tiresome prolixity of Plato's dialectic, the reasoning is summarized from time to time. Perhaps this may be well enough for the larger public for which the work is meant, but the breaks give an uncomfortable feeling of uncertainty, of incompleteness, that is not compensated by the small economy of space; and the better plan would have been to give the argument in the margin—an indispensable thing for Plato—and to let the reader do his own skipping. To be sure, the bulk of the 'Gorgias,' which is the longest of the Platonic dialogues, always excepting, of course, the 'Republic' and the 'Laws,' may be pleaded in justification of the abridgment; but for our part we do not like to see any support given to the notion that Plato's leisurely unfolding of his thought is due to the rawness of his dialectic method. This is of a piece with the other favorite theory, that the peculiar style of Thucydides is due to the unformed condition of Attic prose; and in popularizing Plato the translator does injustice to an unusually good rendering by giving it the amateurish form of a selection.

Of course it would be easy to find fault with this and that translation. We might say that the translator feels the Greek too much, that too much meaning is put into common words, which is the besetting sin of Conington and other "vivid" and "picturesque" interpreters. "Fingerhut" and "Handschuh" amuse the novice in German. After a while, if they do not become mere counters for "thimble" and "glove," they fall into the German sphere of vision, and lose their oddity for ever. And so to press the etymology of words in any language beyond the national consciousness is a decided mistake. For instance, "Looking forward to the Truth," the sub-title of the book, is far more to us than τὴν ἀλήθειαν σκοπῶν was to Plato. Whether it would have been possible to bring out the dramatic peculiarities more fully—to give one style to Polus and another to Callicles—is a matter that cannot be discussed without illustrations, and certainly cannot be discussed here. Nor can we show where a firmer grasp of syntax would have given a sharper edge to translation. The Platonic variety of vocabulary is well preserved, but this is not so noteworthy, as it might be proved that the eager quest of variety, so characteristic of English style, comes into it by lineal succession from Plato himself.

The introduction and notes will be found helpful by those for whom they are intended, and it is pleasant to see that the sympathy with Plato goes so far as to make the translator withstand the redoubtable Grote, whose defence of the sophists through thick and thin has really done harm to the views which he advocated, unless one is philosophical enough to be amused at the Jack-in-a-box fashion in which the sophist question pops up in the most out-of-the-way places. It were hardly to be expected that the translator should appreciate the importance of Thrasymachus, who was something more than "the pretentious bully whose only weapon is invective," for the real importance of Thrasymachus is to be sought elsewhere, and to acknowledge that Plato is a sad caricaturist would not harmonize with the cult vowed to Plato's memory. Perhaps, also, a demurrer might be entered against the preference given to Gorgias before Protagoras as a gentleman. Surely nothing could be more gentlemanly than the way in which Protagoras closes the discussion, and the effect of the dialogue that bears the name of the Abderite is, on the whole, more pleasing. The 'Gorgias' is doubtless the more important work philosophically, and the meaning is not so concealed in the form as is the case with the 'Protagoras'; but to the lover of the artist Plato there is something too suggestive of the big drum in the 'Gorgias.' But the impression which a given dialogue of Plato produces, like the impression of a landscape, is very much an affair of mood and of light, and cannot communicate itself through translation.

American Literature, 1607-1885. Vol. I. The Development of American Thought. By Charles F. Richardson. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

THE reason why Mr. Richardson has put the least attractive portion of his work foremost was, presumably, because it is a law of historical narrative to begin with the beginning. It is apparently a history that he means to write, although this volume exhibits also the characteristics of a critical survey, an enlarged manual of facts, and an encyclopædia with authors' biographies and illustrative extracts. It is not a straightforward consecutive narrative, and yet it is more a history than anything else namable. The author excludes from treatment all fiction and poetry, which he reserves for subsequent examination. There remains to be considered the literature of thought as distinguished from that of imagination, and no one needs to be told that American thought was at first theological, then political, and passed slowly into its present literary and scientific stage. Mr. Richardson, who desires to treat literature in a large way, has analyzed the race inheritance of the colonists and the influencing environment of soil, institutions, and religious faith, and has traced the development, by expansion and assimilation, of the original English stock into the American nation. Consequently, as was natural, he adopts in his narrative the order of history: first, the records and diaries of the colonists; secondly, the works of the theologians; thirdly, the writings of the statesmen and orators; and then, in somewhat mingled array, Irving, Emerson, the critics, historians, humorists, ending inevitably in the "miscellaneous."

The plan is too large for the materials. The nation has not expressed its life in literature so fully that its organization and growth can be summed up in a history of its literature. In the colonial period, where the facts are few and simple, the author sets them forth excellently, with theology as the thought-product of the age; but no one knows better than he that these sermons and treatises are no part of literature. On the other hand, when the times of Webster and Lincoln, of Irving and Emerson, are reached, where the facts are many and complex, the author's grasp of them relaxes, his reference to them is meagre, and he silently drops history for criticism. In proportion as he ceases to be a sociologist, he becomes a reviewer. His work, after he gets into it, is truly no more than an account of the principal books written on this side in all departments, with some details of the lives of their makers and some excerpts by way of sample. It is a valuable work; and in being less comprehensive than an avowed encyclopædia, and less exclusive than a history of pure literature, it fills its place as a useful larger manual.

One thing, however, is very noticeable in its pages, and confers distinction upon it. In his introduction the author discusses what he calls the perspective of American literature. He deprecates the illiberal patriotism which exalts our books because they are ours, and he repeats the obvious truth that our authors must at last measure with those of other lands and of past times, no less now, when it is the English fashion to praise us, than in the early days, when it was so much in vogue to blackguard us; and he sets out to pass judgment in this catholic way on the dead and the living. What he says is admirable in truth and in temper; it is a sign of enfranchisement from colonialism, of a genuine culture spreading in the community, when conviction and purpose of this sort are found in a work of the secondary class; and the author keeps his word, but not quite heroically. He frequently remarks that the books with which he is dealing are not literature, but he includes them; and though he reprehends Mr. Stedman's good nature in allowing the names of the lower ten thousand to constitute literary annals, he is not wholly blameless in this same matter. In particular he has a weakness for burdening his pages with a theological weight, until one fancies that the fossil age in our literature never came to a happy end.

After making all allowance for one who is attempting to write five hundred octavo pages on American literature, and yet exclude all works of imagination from view, one cannot but think that, to reverse the poet's line, Mr. Richardson knew better than he builded. He, too, has exhibited the genial temperament, the large toleration, the easy-mindedness which he deplores in others; but rather, be it said, in admitting the candidates than in allowing their claims. The discriminative spirit, the sense of what the English and other nations have accomplished in letters, the honesty to admit that dead and dying names are in fact perishable, always enter into his criticism. Our literature began with Irving, and the debt due to him is justly felt to be large; but it is a new thing to find a writer compressing his voluminous works into the narrow compass of the 'Sketch-Book,' and deciding that this small and early book is what survives. And if Irving is thus looked on, what becomes of the Knickerbocker School? It is not, however, so hard to tell the truth about the wholly dead, as about those who, though buried, still live in the memory of friends. It takes more courage, humorous as it seems, to doubt that Ripley was a fine critic than to deny that Irving was a great historian; and he must be brave indeed who would pluck a Pleiad from the starry crown of Margaret Fuller. But as to Dr. Ripley, Mr. Richardson modestly suggests that "one can hardly assign to this veteran American critic a high or permanent place in our literary history," and, growing bolder, ventures to speak of "the essential hollowness of one who for so long a time seemed 'the Nestor of American criticism.'" With Margaret Fuller the writer's caution is almost comical: "Of the influence exerted by Dr. Ripley, who did not write a single book of high rank, I have just spoken. Equally notable . . . was that exerted by Margaret Fuller." Mr. Richardson is anxious to do justice to individuals, and at the same time not to discredit the Muses; and between the two he has as hard a task as any critic need wish to be delivered from. It is not often that he has the pleasure of pointing out some service to our literature which has been forgotten or underestimated; but once he does so, and very justly, in calling attention to Longfellow's early influence as an expository critic in making foreign literatures known here and arousing an interest in them.

This temper, this trial at writing a history of American literature which shall be truthful and set forth our achievement in just comparison with that of other countries, this willingness to submit to a universal standard of criticism, are invaluable traits; and for their sake we would gladly have said nothing but good of a book which seemed to us so defective and unfortunate in its plan. The useful results which may follow when this method is applied frankly to our works of imagination, as it will be in the second volume, one need not forecast. In this volume the greatest reputations are not dealt with, except Irving's and Emerson's, and the latter is not shorn of its halo, though the direction of future criticism is to be discerned in the remark upon the essential narrowness of view involved in his religious revolt. The historians are admirably treated, with fulness, distinctness, and vigor; the critics, except for Lowell, would make a poor showing; and the humorists are dismissed with scant grace. It is upon the sentences, not too softly turned, which remind Frank Stockton and Mark Twain of their mortality, that attack might easiest be directed; yet the utmost of the author's contention seems to be that humor cannot dispense with literary art if it would be lasting. For the faithful investigation which is everywhere patent, and for the sound judgment and excellent proportion of the work, one must make due acknowledgment; but much more for the spirit of its criticism. What the writer has to say of our poets and novelists will be awaited with interest; but without that supplement, the present volume offers a broad, sensible, and scholarly view of American books which have won distinction in any field, and will be very helpful to the study of our literary past.

The Synthetic Philosophy of Expression, as Applied to the Arts of Reading, Oratory, and Personation. By Moses True Brown. Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

THIS eccentric work is another illustration of the fact that every science has to pass through a stage of vague mysticism corresponding to alchemy and astrology. For although Mr. Brown prints the names of Darwin and Mantegazza on his cover as a sort of motto, he adds—evil omen—the name of Delsarte; and his book does not remove the peculiar impression made on the mind by this ill-assorted triad of names. The author has carefully read a number of modern scientific works, and often quotes from them so felicitously that one cannot but wonder that a mind which evidently appreciates the import of facts, should constantly indulge in wild flights of rhetorical nothingness, and weave a network of artificial and complicated distinctions and classifications that almost out-Hegel Hegel. After noting the assertion of the author's belief that the pendulum of evolution will ultimately swing back from Darwin to Swedenborg (!), the reader is quite prepared to find his physiognomic theories about on a level with the discredited bump-phrenology and the vagaries of Carus and Lavater. The author's hobby is a certain trinitarian formula, which is made to do service everywhere in defiance of common sense, psychology, and physiology. He tells us that man "manifests three natures," the vital, the mental, and the emotive—notwithstanding the fact that modern psychologists agree in using the word mental as comprehending all phenomena of the mind. Then he goes to work and divides every part of the body into "zones," one of which has a "vital," another a "mental," and the third an "emotive" significance. To take a few illustrations: "The natural language of the head is Mental, of the torso Emotive (!), of the limbs Vital." Then the torso is again divided into three zones, with corresponding differences of expression. Concerning the arm we read that "the Vital moves all parts of the arm from the centre at the shoulder," "the Emotive from the centre at the elbow," "the Mental from the centre at the wrist." This sort of thing is continued with amusing naïveté on every part of the body. But there is a point at which even Mr. Brown feels tempted to "draw the line." After noting that some of Delsarte's pupils represented the master as teaching that "in expression, the eyebrow is Mental, the upper lid is 'Moral,' the lower lid is Vital," he, though with awe and trepidation, ventures to suggest that this may possibly be a case of blind adherence to "the universal formula." These are specimens of the quasi-scientific puerilities that make up the greater part of a book which, if condensed to a twenty-page essay and freed from all metaphysical jargon and efforts at cosmic generalization, would have been readable and suggestive.

The Functions of the Brain. By David Ferrier, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S. Second edition, rewritten and enlarged. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1886.

THE first edition of Dr. Ferrier's work, noticed in the Nation of June 14, 1877, page 355, contained references to eighty-eight writers. That the second refers to two hundred and thirty-eight is evidence of the intense cerebral activity which has characterized the last decade. It may seem that this is sufficient reason for the increased bulk of the present volume; yet, while the additional illustrations are mostly welcome, and more space was undoubtedly needed for the presentation of the results of the author's own later experiments and reflections and for the discussion of controverted points—as, for example, "the visual area" and the question of "functional substitution"—much might have been compressed or even altogether omitted so as to keep the book at a convenient size. For neurophysiologists and most members of the medical profession, much of the anatomy is needless, particularly the elementary and practically repeated accounts of the fissures and gyres of monkeys and man on pages 235-240, 470-480; on the other hand, the details are inadequate to the needs of the laity, especially with the omission of the "Diagrammatic Summary" on page 290 of the first edition, which might have been easily made acceptable. It is equally difficult to account for the omission of the unique and instructive "Crowbar case," since it would seem to accord with the author's views respecting the inhibitory function of the prefrontal lobe. An even less commendable reduction is in the index, which was admirable in the first edition, but, excepting the names of writers, extremely defective in this. A well-known American clinician is not cited at all; another's careful contribution is hastily and unfairly said (page 293) to be "characterized by numerous gross inaccuracies;" and the volume is literally disfigured by contemptuous allusions to the opinions of a German neurologist whose works are commonly held in respect. There are, indeed, too many passages which might well convince the disinterested reader that the pursuit of experimental physiology does not insure appropriate methods, careful manipulation, accurate observation, logical deduction, scrupulous recognition of adverse results, or even courteous treatment of antagonists.

Mathematical Teaching, and its Modern Methods. By Truman Henry Safford. Boston: D. C. Heath & Co. 1887.

THIS little brochure, one of the earliest of a series of monographs on education, prepared, or to be prepared, by distinguished instructors for the use of the teaching profession, should be read and pondered by every professor and teacher of mathematics in the land. The author has two qualifications for writing on the subject which are not often combined in one person: he is a skilled applier of mathematics in that branch of science where most extensively used, and he is a practical teacher of the subject. We might add a third qualification, that of a philosophic observer, able to analyze the current defects of teaching as shown in the work of his pupils, and to see how they should be cured.

What he tells us is already well known to all who have had to train graduates of our schools and colleges in the practical use of any branch of mathematics, whether arithmetic or the calculus. All our teaching of the subject is too abstract and unpractical. The very bias toward instructing the common boy in nothing but the useful, which we see so strongly developed in school boards, defeats its own object by leading to a system that cramps more than it enlarges the mental powers. The wearisome passage through a graded series of arithmetics in which the subject is taught over and over on the same plane, changed only by the introduction of more perplexing problems as the pupil advances, is not so conducive to an understanding of numbers as half the quantity of teaching might be when combined with elementary algebra and graphical representations of the principles involved.

The only fault we find with Prof. Safford's discussion is one which it is difficult to avoid in such a work—a lack of explicitness and point in showing how mathematics should be taught. The teacher who goes through the book will see well enough what is wrong in our present system, but we fear he will be perplexed in deciding how he is to correct the wrong. He will find many good words about Grube and his method, but how is he to find out who Grube is and what his method is? Some of our teachers think that a student of solid geometry ought not to use a material figure to represent the lines and planes he is reasoning about, because he ought to have all the necessary conceptions ready-made in his own mind. These teachers will find very wholesome instruction in the importance of "objectivity" in teaching, and the necessity of object lessons; but it hardly suffices to have the author suggest the use of the stereoscope, the walls of the class-room, the magic lantern, etc. We question whether Prof. Safford does not lay too much stress on teaching the facts of geometry, as though mere facts were any more fruitful here than in any other branch of knowledge. The greatest defect in all our mathematical teaching, so far as immediate results are concerned, is that it does not give the student a clear and ready conception of the numbers and magnitudes he is working with and talking about. Such expressions as "seven per cent.," "three-thirteenths," and "two right angles," are to him little more than meaningless phrases, which he knows how to use, but which do not represent any accurate quantitative conceptions in his own mind. What we want is a system of quickening such conceptions; and we cannot but wish our author had shown more explicitly how this is to be done.

A Tramp Trip. How to See Europe on Fifty Cents a Day. By Lee Meriwether. Harper & Bros. 1887.

THE author of this very interesting and instructive volume visited Europe apparently for the purpose of investigating at first hand the condition of the laboring people of the Continent, and has made a formal report to the United States Labor Bureau. In order to mingle with the people more directly and intimately, he made a large part of the journey on foot, or by water in the steerage, and lived as inexpensively as possible. In this narrative, which is always sprightly and alive, he tells the incidents of his tour from New York to Naples, thence north through Switzerland to South Germany, down the Danube to Constantinople, and north again through Russia to St. Petersburg, and by the Berlin and Amsterdam route to England. The bulk of the book is made up of his experiences in Italy, the Danubian provinces, and Russia; and, seeing these countries in so unusual a way, he naturally has a large number of adventures and strange incidents to relate. The object he had in view, however—the condition of the poor, the rate of wages and scale of daily subsistence—is always before his eyes; and he seems to have done his work very well. The chapters, consequently, afford an admirable illustration of Mr. Edward Atkinson's recent statistical articles, and are profitable reading in connection with them. What the state of the peasantry of Europe is, one knows well enough in general terms, but it is always a surprise to find the special features of it; and when they are set forth with such directness and plainness as they are here, it is an invigorating surprise. One could quote hundreds of facts, were it useful, from these pages; and could select particular characterizations—the Roman shepherd, the Bulgarian peasant, the Neapolitan foreman—admirably drawn without any literary art or philanthropic feeling to color the simple facts seen by a young American observer. The bearing of the tariff and of military expenses is constantly borne in mind also, so that the work is unfairly represented by its title, which does not give the right idea of the nature of the contents. As a book of mere travel it is very practical and readable. When the writer ventures on the ordinary tourist topics of museums and antiquities he is less successful, but such passages are few, and there is comparatively little of journalistic sensationalism. The actual life of the country and its prominent phases, seized in a rapid journey (for though on foot the writer made brief stops), are the substance. The description of the steerage passage down the Danube and the chapters on Constantinople are particularly vivid.

The book is, altogether, quite out of the range of and above ordinary volumes of travel, and will give a fair, comprehensive idea of the hard labor and miserable poverty of the European masses. To do this was worth all the trials and hardships of the plucky explorer, who seems to have enjoyed his uncomfortable days with a light heart. A comparative tariff table is affixed in an appendix, and, from the frequency with which the author ridicules the idea that a tariff makes high wages, it would appear that he hopes his observations will enforce the gospel of free trade. Certainly, protectionists will get no comfort from him or his facts.

"I hope I may be able to present some facts in respect to the present situation of Brazil which will be both instructive and entertaining to general readers. My means of acquaintance with that empire are principally derived from a residence of three years at Rio de Janeiro, its capital, while employed in the service of the United States Government, during which period I made a few journeys into the interior."—From the Preface.

Miss Churchill:

A STUDY. By CHRISTIAN REID, author of 'A Daughter of Bohemia,' 'Morton House,' 'Bonny Kate,' etc., etc. 12mo. Price, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

The author calls 'Miss Churchill' a study for the reason that it consists so largely of a study of character; but there is no little variety of scene in the story, the action taking place partly in the South and partly in Europe, while the experiences and vicissitudes of the heroine are of great interest. The contrasts of place and character make it a very vivid picture.

HAVE NOW READY:

THE STORY OF PERSIA. By Hon. S. G. W. Benjamin, lately United States Minister to Persia. Large 12mo, fully illustrated, $1.50. (No. XIII. Story of the Nations.)

"The present volume is a history of Persia as it has been, presenting a narrative of the most noteworthy characters and events of that ancient empire from its foundation in prehistoric times. The work differs from other histories of Persia in giving more proportionate attention to the legendary period of her history than is usual with those who have dealt with this subject, as well as to the great career of the House of Sassân, which, in the opinion of the author, has never received full justice from those Christian historians who have undertaken a connected history of Persia."—From Author's Preface.

"Miss Jewett has studied her subject thoroughly, and gives in this volume the cream of larger and more comprehensive works."—Springfield (Mass.) Union.

A REAL GARDEN!

The fourth and enlarged edition of our book, A FEW FLOWERS WORTHY OF GENERAL CULTURE, ready February 1st, is certainly the most beautiful work on flowers yet published. In it we have endeavored to show how a most lovely and fascinating garden can be made with hardy plants, and how great a mistake is the present almost universal custom of using nothing but the so-called bedding plants—geraniums, coleus, etc.—for gardening purposes. The book is superbly printed, and among its contents are the following illustrated papers: "Hardy Plants and the Modes of Arranging Them," "Tropical Garden Effects," "Hardy Plants in England," "Decorative Possibilities of Hardy Climbers," "Roses Old and New," "Splendid Garden Effects with Hardy Lilies," "The Making of the Hardy Border," "Success with Hardy Roses," and "Rhododendrons, Kalmias, and Hardy Azaleas." The illustrations are profuse and most artistic, and show the garden effects of different plants.

This book of real merit and exquisite beauty will be sent, postpaid, for 50c., bound in durable flexible covers, or in leather for 75c.; but the price paid will be allowed on the first order sent for plants, making the book really free to customers.

Our Descriptive Catalogue, containing a complete list of the best New and Old varieties of Roses, Clematises, Rhododendrons, Hardy Azaleas, Carnations, Lilies, Tuberous, Begonias, Gloxinias, and the largest collection of Hardy Plants in America, sent on receipt of 10 cents in stamps.

Our Special Low-Priced Offers of valuable and well-grown plants sent free.

The Musa Ensete (The Great Abyssinian Banana) is a remarkable and the most beautiful plant known for producing a tropical effect in the garden or lawn. We have a large and almost exclusive stock, which we offer at very low prices.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY,

ON HISTORICAL PRINCIPLES:

Founded mainly on the materials collected by

THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

EDITED BY

JAMES A. H. MURRAY,

B.A. LONDON, HON. M.A. OXON., LL.D. EDINB., D.C.L. DURHAM, ETC.

SOMETIME PRESIDENT OF THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY;

WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF MANY SCHOLARS AND MEN OF SCIENCE.

PART III extends to the end of Bo–. It deals, in all, with 8,765 words, and the articles which it contains will be found to be replete with interest and instruction to every reader. It is a characteristic of the letter B (shared only by some letters of less compass toward the end of the alphabet) that a very small proportion of the words beginning with it are derived from or through Latin, the great majority being Teutonic, either of the native Old English stock or of the accessions which this received from the kindred speech of the Norsemen. Hence the present part deals with many of the oldest and most interesting words of the language, which are also among its most important living elements in every-day use. In the course of their long-continued service, many of these have branched out into a vast network of senses (see BE, BEAR, BEET, BOARD, BOX), which it puzzles the lexicographer to disentangle, and even more to display in an orderly arrangement helpful to the reader. Especial attention is called to the number of words (about 1,600), chiefly verbs and their derivatives, formed with the prefix be-, and their treatment in the Dictionary. In the ETYMOLOGY, much more original work has had to be done than in the two preceding Parts. The B- words are full of puzzles, which have baffled the efforts of all etymologists: every one of these has received a fresh and independent investigation, in which the Editor has had the coöperation of the most eminent philologists of Europe, and the result has been the discovery of new facts or the elimination of old errors in the history of hundreds of words.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:

ENGLISH.

"No one will hesitate to say that the speedy completion of this vast undertaking is, or ought to be, an object of great concern to every educated speaker of English. . . . Every Englishman who can possibly afford it ought to do his part in forwarding this great enterprise of national interest by purchasing the parts as they appear."—Athenæum.

"An achievement without parallel."—Academy.

"The execution beggars all eulogy. . . . This wonderful book."—St. James's Gazette.

"For the first time we have a dictionary based on historical principles presented to us. . . . If any one will look at the development of the different senses in Dr. Murray's Dictionary, all the quotations being given in the order of their age, . . . he cannot fail to be struck with the amount of research displayed and the perspicuity with which the results are set forth. . . . A work of this description is truly a national work."—Spectator.

AMERICAN.

"That great Anglo-Saxon undertaking. . . . We need hardly remind our readers that this work ought to be not only in every gentleman's library, but in every intelligent household."—Nation.

"Certainly the Englishmen of this generation will bequeath to those that come after them no richer legacy than this."—New York Times.

"This dictionary is the most important contribution ever yet made to the history of our language. No one is safe in giving the history of an English word without consulting it. No one can consult it without learning something. . . . No student of language can do without it; every Anglo-Saxonmay be proud of it."—Independent.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 3, 1887.

The Week.

A GREAT many strange things have happened to the Democratic party during the past thirty years, besides the nomination of Horace Greeley for the Presidency, but probably nothing stranger than the suppression, at a Democratic dinner, of a letter from a Democratic statesman recommending the party to take up the cause of individual freedom against the tyranny of secret societies, composed of "irresponsible men unknown to the people, who are not officers chosen by the people, and who are not creatures of law responsible to free public opinion and to the constituted authorities for their action," and who make a practice of coercing citizens into joining their society by trying to prevent their earning a living, "by calling them opprobrious names, hunting them from shop to shop, and denying them employment on the fearful penalty of stopping all work, however pressing and important." This is the description given by Mayor Hewitt of the condition of a large body of American citizens known in the slang of the day as "Scabs." Their lives are literally lives of slavery. Every injury that can be done to them short of murder is openly justified by their tyrants. Moreover, they constitute the great majority of the class of manual laborers, and their oppressors are enabled to hold them in subjection owing to the fact that they are not organized, and rely solely on the law of the land and on public opinion for liberty and security.

The most careless reader of the history of the Democratic party would suppose that, in the prevailing scarcity of issues, it would eagerly take up the cause of this oppressed and outraged portion of the community, and smash the secret organizations which are seeking, before the Constitution is one hundred years old, to supplant or override the Government, and inflict the most fearful penalties without judge or jury. The party took its rise, almost as soon as the Government was founded, as the champion and defender of the rights of the individual against thrones, principalities, and powers of every description. "A man's a man for a' that" was its motto from the very beginning, especially if he was a white man. It has been preaching, in season and out of season, for eighty years, through all its sages and prophets, the doctrine that the larger the liberty of the individual man, and the less he was interfered with by government of any kind, the better for the community at large. Nevertheless, in our time, we are actually witnessing the strange spectacle, to which Mr. Hewitt has called attention, of "Democrats, holding very high positions, coquetting with this new and dangerous element in politics, and even attaining office by submitting to the humiliation of an apparent endorsement of the false and dangerous doctrines which have been put in practice at such fearful cost in our own midst within the present month."

There is no limit to the inebrieties of the official mind when once the habit is formed of indulging in Labor as a beverage. The saddest example is that of Gov. Hill, but he has many imitators in the Legislature, some of whom have been overcome to the extent of introducing a bill (Senate bill No. 65) making every Saturday in the year a legal holiday. Others, not quite so far advanced, have stopped at the point of making every Saturday a half-holiday, their views being embodied in Senate bill No. 70. There is no requirement in either of these bills that anybody shall stop working on Saturday, or desist from doing anything that he would do if Saturday were not a holiday. The banks, and the Stock Exchange, and the Clearing-house, and every business place may go on the same as before, and will go on unless a streak of idleness comes over the American people, which is now quite unexpected. The only thing either of these bills can do is to put obstacles and confusion of a legal sort into the pathway of business men, by making them pay their notes, and draw money out of the banks, and fulfil their contracts, twenty-four or forty-eight hours before the time agreed on. This is the only thing really compulsory in the bill. There are now six legal holidays in each year. It is proposed to add fifty-two more, not to relieve anybody from work, but merely to serve as fifty-two tubs to the whale, constructed and launched at the expense and loss of the business community. How great this loss must be, we can infer from the fact that the payments effected at the Clearing-house in this city amount to more than one hundred million dollars per day, and that it is proposed to require them to be made a day earlier than the contract of payment requires on fifty-two days in the year: i. e., one day's interest on $5,200,000,000 is to be juggled with at the behest of Labor and without doing Labor any good. As New York is the general clearing-house for the whole country, the inconvenience and loss resulting from such a local measure would be spread abroad everywhere, and must result in diverting trade more or less from a place where such needless and wanton impediments are put in the way of commerce.

The question of passing the Pauper Pension Bill over the veto came up for decision in the House on Thursday afternoon, and the President was sustained by twenty-five more than the requisite number of Representatives. The total vote was 300, and 200 yeas would have been required to pass the bill, "the President's objections to the contrary notwithstanding," whereas only 175 were recorded in the affirmative, against 125 in the negative. Upon the original passage of the bill the vote stood 180 yeas to 76 nays, or considerably more than two-thirds in the affirmative. The final defeat of the measure is thus due to the changes produced by the President's attitude, no less than twenty-eight members who had hastily voted for the bill on its first passage having the manliness to confess their blunder and vote against it on Thursday. The significant feature of the division is the fact that the Republican vote in the House was cast solidly for the bill. It was so cast deliberately. When the bill first came up its vicious character was not generally understood, and it was supposed that public sentiment would sustain it. There was thus some excuse for the unanimous Republican vote in its favor originally; but, during the four weeks which have since passed, that excuse has been removed. The demoralizing nature of the measure has been exposed, and the leading Republican newspapers of the country, almost without exception, have condemned it in the most severe terms. With like approach to unanimity, the Republican press has endorsed the veto, and warned Republican Congressmen that the public sentiment of the country would sustain the President. The pretence that self-respecting soldiers—and the opinion of others is worthless—desired such a bill, has been swept away by the vigorous protests against the measure of such eminent Republican generals as Chamberlain of Maine and Cox of Ohio.

The President continues to veto private pension bills in unworthy cases. His latest message returns without his approval the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah Hamilton, on the ground that her deceased husband died in 1883 of disability incurred in the army twenty years before. The widow's application was originally rejected upon the ground, which appears to be clearly established, that Hamilton's death was not the result of his military service; but Congress nevertheless passed an act granting her request. It appears from the army records that Hamilton enlisted September 2, 1862, deserted May 27, 1863, and his name was dropped from the subsequent rolls until February 29, 1864, when he was reported as a deserter in arrest. He was not borne upon the rolls for March and April, 1864; for May and June, 1864, he was reported absent in arrest; for July and August, present under arrest; and for September and October, present for duty. He was mustered out with his company May 24, 1865. Hamilton appears to be a good sample of "the rubbish of the army," as Gen. Bragg calls such men, and that there was a larger proportion of such rubbish than one likes to think, is clear enough from the number of such cases which Mr. Cleveland has blocked.

Mr. Cleveland never omits an opportunity to enforce the doctrine that the Government should not support the people. In vetoing the bill for a public building at Portsmouth, Ohio, he cites the claim of the promoter of the measure that there is not a Federal public building in the State of Ohio east of a line drawn on the map from Cleveland through Columbus to Cincinnati, and that, "when wealth and population and the needs of the public service are considered, the distribution of public buildings in the State is an unfair one." The President condemns this theory of expenditure for public buildings as untenable, pointing out that if an application for the erection of such a building is to be determined by the distance between its proposed location and another public building, or upon the allegation that a certain division of a State is without a Government building, or that the distribution of these buildings in a particular State is unfair, we shall rapidly be led to an entire disregard of the considerations of necessity and public need, which it seems to him should alone justify the expenditure of public funds for such a purpose. "The care and protection which the Government owes to the people," he adds, "do not embrace the grant of public buildings to decorate thriving and prosperous cities and villages, nor should such buildings be erected upon any principle of fair distribution among localities. The Government is not an almoner of gifts among the people, but an instrumentality by which the people's affairs should be conducted upon business principles, regulated by the public needs."

The condition of the proposed constitutional amendment for a change of the date of inauguration from early in March to the end of April is this: The Senate has passed the resolution for such an amendment. In the House a resolution was introduced providing that an additional clause shall be incorporated, by which the term of a new Congress shall begin on the second Tuesday in the January succeeding its election, beginning with the year 1889, the terms of members of the Fiftieth Congress expiring on December 31, 1888, without any decrease of their salary. One effect of this change would be that the short session would be a month longer than now—from the beginning of January till the end of April, instead of from the beginning of December to the beginning of March, while the long term would not be impaired, as under the present system nothing is ever done until after the Christmas holidays.

Another effect would be, that the theory of members of the House "coming fresh from the people" would be put in practice by their taking their seats in two months after their election, to legislate upon the live issues upon which they were presumably elected, instead of waiting, as they do now, until December of the year following their election—thirteen months afterwards. Another advantage would be, that there would be no election between the sessions, but the record of members for both sessions would be fully made up, and the work of the Congress to which they were elected completed, before they were called upon to render an account of their stewardship. Under the present system a defeated Congressman generally feels at the short session, after his successor's election, as though he were no longer the representative of his people, and such members are notoriously more open to corrupt and demagogical motives during this session than they would be if they were making a record for their constituents to challenge. Moreover, the proposed change would remove a most anomalous feature of our present system—that which devolves the choice of a President, in case there is no popular election, not upon the House of Representatives just chosen, but upon one elected two years before, and often in the meantime repudiated by the people. These advantages are plain and great, and we perceive no counterbalancing defects. We are glad, therefore, to hear that there is a good prospect of an agreement between the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and House upon an amendment embodying both the change in the date of inauguration and that in the meeting of Congress, and we trust that the two branches will sustain this action of the committees.

An arbitration bill for the settlement of differences between railroad corporations and their employees has passed both houses of Congress. It provides that when both parties agree to arbitrate, the railroad company "is hereby authorized" to select one person, and the employee or employees another, and these two persons a third, who are to constitute a board of arbitration. They are to have the power to subpoena witnesses, and compel them to testify about everything but the "secrets" or "records" or "proceedings" of labor organizations. The arbitrators are to get $10 a day, and the witnesses the ordinary fees paid in United States courts. The power of the arbitrators is, however, confined to the announcement of their award. No penalty is provided for disobeying it, nor is any machinery provided for enforcing it. In fact, the only thing the bill does for the promotion of arbitration is the bestowal on the board of the power to send for persons and papers under compulsory process, and the assumption by the United States Treasury of the expenses of the proceeding. This is certainly important, and, where both parties are really anxious to lay their case before the public, will doubtless do much to bring arbitration about.

In nine cases out of ten, however, the Knights of Labor will not resort to it under this bill, because the strikes managed by the Knights are all, or nearly all, sympathetic strikes, or strikes undertaken by laborers who have no grievances in order to help laborers who have. Other strikes are set on foot and managed by the parties immediately concerned. A sympathetic or Knightly strike, however, on the Powderly principle that "the injury of one is the concern of all," will never bear examination before any body of rational men outside a district assembly. The rule that when a man hears that his neighbor has a row with his employer, he is bound to have a row with his employer too, or that when one debtor hears that another debtor has been treated harshly by his creditors, he is bound, although his own credit is perfectly good, to suspend payments, is one, of course, which will always be "dismissed with a smile" by any one fit to sit in a board of arbitration. Therefore, these sympathetic strikes and boycotts, which are really the only ones which cause much trouble or create any serious industrial disturbance, will probably be rarely if ever settled under this bill.

The annual farce in which the Department of State and the two houses of Congress take part, has been lately presented to the country with some slight changes. Heretofore, when the estimates for the foreign service were transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House, they were submitted to and considered by a sub-committee of the standing Committee on Appropriations, who, from the manner of their appointment, usually possessed no previous acquaintance with the subject, and who were intent only upon reducing the appropriation to the lowest limit. It was thought that, under the change in the rules by means of which the Committee on Foreign Relations was permitted to provide the appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service, there would be much less difficulty in securing decent allowances. But the main features of the farce have been nevertheless retained. In the first place, like the astute attorney who "lays" damages at twenty times the amount he hopes to obtain, the Department asked for money for this purpose and for that, trusting that at least something more than the usual sum might be granted. The Committee, more compliant than the sub-committee was wont to be, requested the House to look with favor upon nearly every item of the estimates. Of course, under the rules of that body which forbid increase of pay or provision for a new object in appropriation bills, every such item was voted down. Important consulates were left unprovided for, and changes, evidently in the interest of true economy, strenuously insisted upon by the Committee, were doggedly refused. In the Senate many of the stricken provisions were restored, and new ones were added "to bargain with."

What is to follow is the most amusing part of the performance. The House will reject without debate the Senate amendments, and a committee of conference will be suggested. The Senate will refuse to recede and will accept the conference. The two committees will meet in secret session, make some kind of a bargain, which will, perhaps, contain entirely new matter never before proposed in either house, and report, amid the confusion of the last days of Congress, as follows: "The Committee of Conference having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to their respective houses, that the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 6, 25, and 64. That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 5, 23, and 61," etc., etc. Without having any idea of the extent of the changes recommended in this report, it will be adopted without debate in both houses, after a hasty reading by the clerk. The bill as finally passed may not, and most likely will not, speak the mind of the Secretary of State, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House, or the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. For any defects, however glaring, or for any extravagance, however gross, it may contain, no one on earth will be responsible.

The Register of the Treasury has placed in the list of debtors to the Government, published a few months since, the name of Edmund Randolph, our second Secretary of State. It will surprise most people to learn that, in the early days of the Government, the Secretary of State himself disbursed the funds provided for our diplomatic and consular establishments, and became personally responsible for their proper application. An arrangement was made about the beginning of this century by which fiscal agents, who have always been London bankers, disbursed these funds and became personally accountable to the Treasury for them. This custom still continues, though it has no special legislative sanction. In what precise manner Mr. Randolph incurred the large liability of over $60,000 we do not know, but it is a matter of history that a suit was instituted against him in 1797 for the recovery of this amount, which, after much difficulty, resulted in a judgment against him in 1804. This judgment was for about $53,000, with interest until paid. It seems that Mr. Nicholas, one of his sureties, entered into an agreement with the attorney for the Government for the discharge of this judgment by the assignment of certain bonds to the United States, secured by a lien on valuable real estate. This realty was in course of time sold and "bought in" by the Government for about $4,000, with which amount Mr. Randolph was credited, though at a subsequent sale this property yielded the United States over $10,000. It is understood that the various credits entered from time to time from the sale of bonds and land really amounted to as much or nearly as much as the original judgment, but to this had been added, when the last computation was made at the Treasury, which was more than fifty years ago, over $60,000 interest. Mr. Randolph's indebtedness was not, therefore, at all diminished when this last settlement was stated, and at the present day the accumulated interest is at least four times the amount of the principal.

Taking into consideration all the circumstances of this case, the doubts that were originally entertained by the court concerning some of the charges made by the Treasury against Mr. Randolph, the profit obtained by the Government in the land transaction, and the absolute impossibility of recovering another cent on the judgment, it would seem that a Congressional investigation concerning the propriety of blotting out this indebtedness would be in order. Indeed, the cancellation of all these balances, which have been standing on the books of the Treasury for seventy-five or a hundred years, from which we can hope to derive nothing, and concerning the correctness of which there is so much uncertainty, would be a wise step, and in many instances an act of simple justice to the memory of men who have added to our prosperity and renown. Such relief was granted to the late Mr. Arthur, as Collector of Customs at this port, and to others, without, as far as we know, a dissenting voice.

The Central Labor Union had a good deal of work on its hands on Sunday, for, in addition to denouncing Mr. Powderly, it denounced the majority report of the Legislative Committee which investigated the recent coal strikes, and also Judge Brown of the United States Circuit Court for his decision against the Knights who ordered that strike. Both the Committee and the Judge are arraigned for complicity in a plot to deceive the public, and put the blame for the strike on the industrious laborers of the community. The Judge gets the worst drubbing of all, for his court is set forth as a "tool in the hands of monopolists," and he himself as an agent in a "monopolistic system of anarchism." A resolution which was offered, declaring a boycott upon the entire "capitalistic press of the city," was laid over, probably because the oral Central Laborers were exhausted with the heavy day's work which had gone before. They have now in hand the following business: Repeal of the Penal Code; abolition of the courts; suppression of the entire press, with the exception of Labor's organ the Leader, and Henry George's Standard; complete reorganization of the Legislature in the interest of Labor; and the removal of Mr. Powderly as General Master Workman of the Noble and Holy Order of the Knights of Labor.

When Commissioner Flower of the Wisconsin Labor Bureau made his interesting inquiry into the condition of public sentiment regarding further foreign immigration, and discovered an unexpectedly strong feeling in favor of restrictive measures, many of his correspondents recommended that, as the first step, the State should abolish the Board of Immigration. This Board has maintained several agents in different parts of Europe, and has thus sought to attract as many Europeans as possible to the State, the theory upon which the system was established being that this was the surest way of promoting the prosperity of the commonwealth. A bill to abolish this Board was introduced in the Legislature early in the session and it has already become a law, having passed both branches without a dissenting vote. Such unanimity in the reversal of a long-established policy would be striking in any State, but it is peculiarly impressive in Wisconsin, which has more foreign-born than native voters; and the significance of the Legislature's action was still further emphasized by the fact that there are a number of foreigners among its members. Evidently a change in the American attitude towards immigration has begun.

We have already commented freely on the reformed English election procedure, explaining the strictness of its provisions, and pointing out the ease and certainty of their operation. Sir Henry James at Manchester recently made a speech of great interest on the working of the Corrupt Practices Act. The effect of the act has been that while in 1880, with 3,000,000 voters and only 419 constituencies, the total expense was about £3,000,000 sterling, in 1885, with 5,670,000 electors and 611 constituencies, the cost was only £780,000; and yet in 1885 the election was probably twice as expensive as it would be in future. Ninety-five petitions alleging corrupt practices were presented in 1880; in 1885 there were only two, and in 1886 only one. In fact, corruption at elections as heretofore known no longer exists. But Sir Henry pointed out a still remaining evil, the corrupting influence of the Primrose League and its rival associations—that is, the influence of women. He had been told that no form of act could reach this: "You could not schedule a smile." Yet he hoped to do something to attack this pernicious form of corruption. Perhaps the advocates of woman suffrage may find something in this. They may be trusted to say at least that if the case is so bad, it could not be worse if women had votes. But it is a poor argument that things would not be worse than a condition confessedly bad, against which some remedy must be found, while the fact is that things would be worse: feminine urgency would be increased if women were active participants in elections, while feminine urgency plus votes would be a much stronger means of corruption than the highest degree of feminine urgency alone.

When the Tories came into power in England, not knowing well what to do about the Irish land question, they appointed another Commission of Inquiry, doubtless more with the view of getting time to look around them than with the expectation that the investigation would throw any new light on the situation. The Commission has made its report, which is really a triumph for the Parnellites. It concedes that the fixing of judicial rents for a period of fifteen years under the Land Act of 1881 was a mistake, and recommends five years as a fairer term, thus virtually admitting Parnell's contention that the rents fixed in 1882 are now exorbitant. Worse still, it recommends also the admission of the leaseholders to the benefits of the Act. This exclusion of the leaseholders, who form a very large body of the tenantry, deprived the Act, the Parnellites maintained, of a very large part of its value; but the fact was, that Mr. Gladstone felt that the application of the Act to tenants at will was as far as he dared to go (in the then condition of English opinion) into the matter of interfering with freedom of contract. He doubted if he could carry a bill which would set aside leases. Now, this very thing is recommended by a Tory Commission.

The calamity that has fallen upon the Riviera is even more destructive and lamentable than that which visited the Island of Ischia in the summer of 1883. At this time of the year the shore of the Mediterranean, from Marseilles to Genoa, is thronged with invalids and pleasure-seekers from all parts of the civilized world. The cities of Cannes, Nice, Mentone, San Remo, Savona, and a multitude of lesser communities, not to mention the great gambling hell of Monte Carlo, are now at their maximum of population and prosperity. The delightful climate and rare natural scenery of the region, improved by the continuous labors of man from a period earlier than the foundation of Rome, and rendered accessible by the finest carriage-road in Europe, have made the Riviera perhaps the most attractive spot on the earth's surface. The consternation into which the throngs of visitors and the native population are thrown by an earthquake that has killed 1,000 people and is liable to recur at any moment, must reach the limits of human endurance. Even if there are no more shocks, the fright that the tourist class have received will prove a heavy blow to the prosperity of the region.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, February 23, to TUESDAY, March 1, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE House of Representatives on February 24 refused to pass the Dependent Soldiers' Pension Bill over the President's veto, the vote being yeas 175, nays 125. A two-thirds vote was required. One hundred and thirty-seven Republicans and thirty-eight Democrats, including the Greenback-Democrat, Mr. Weaver of Iowa, voted for the bill. Of these thirty-eight Democrats twenty have not been re-elected. Twenty-eight Democrats who voted for the bill on its first passage changed their votes to the negative in order to sustain the veto. The Republican members of the House all voted to override it.

Senator Sherman resigned the Presidency of the Senate pro tempore, and Senator Ingalls was elected to succeed him, and he entered upon his duties on Saturday.

The United States Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections has continued, at Washington, its examination of witnesses in its investigation of alleged election frauds in Washington County, Texas.

The Legislature of West Virginia failed to elect a United States Senator, and the Governor of the State has appointed D. B. Lucas, Democrat, to serve as Senator after March 4 until a successor to Senator Camden shall have been elected.

The deadlock of the New Jersey Legislature in its effort to elect a successor to United States Senator Sewell is not yet broken. Ex-Gov. Abbett is the leading Democratic candidate, and Senator Sewell the Republican candidate.

The Supreme Court of Indiana has decided that it has no jurisdiction over the question of the election of Lieutenant-Governor. The question whether there was really a vacancy in the office that could be filled by election in last November, was involved and argued, the Democrats holding that the vacancy was one that could only be filled by the election to be held in 1888, the regular quadrennial period for the election of Governor and Lieutenant-Governor. The Democratic presiding officer (Smith) continues to occupy the President's chair of the Senate. When the Republican Lieutenant-Governor (Robinson, elected in November) demanded the seat, he was put out of the Senate by the sergeant-at-arms amid much confusion. The House of Representatives refuses to recognize the Senate as now organized, and the course of legislation is blocked.

Gov. Lee of Virginia has called the Legislature to meet in extra session on March 16 to deal with the complicated financial condition of the State. The specific difficulty which has made an extra session necessary, is the continued effort of the representatives of the bondholders to compel the State to accept its coupons for taxes.

The Excise Committee of the New York Assembly has agreed on and reported the High-License Bill with amendments. The wine license was lowered from $500 to $100, making it the same as the beer license; the druggist's license was increased from $10 to $100, and the grocery-store license from $25 to $50. The highest license was kept at $1,000. In a test vote on the question of recommitting the bill to the Committee, the Republican members with six exceptions cast votes favorable to the measure, and all the Democrats cast unfavorable votes. An effort to make the bill a special order for Thursday was unsuccessful.

Two judicial decisions have this week been handed down which declare the illegality of the boycott. One was in the United States Circuit Court in this city, in the action of the Old Dominion Steamship Company against the managers of the Ocean Association, an organization of freight-handlers. Judge Brown laid down the doctrine that "all associations designed to interfere with the perfect freedom of employers in the proper management and control of their lawful business, or to dictate in any particular the terms upon which their business shall be conducted by means of threats of injury or loss, by interference with their property or traffic, or with their lawful employment of other persons, or designed to abridge any of these rights, are illegal combinations or associations, and all acts done in furtherance of such intentions by such means and accompanied by damage are actionable." The other decision was handed down by the Supreme Court of Connecticut, establishing the same principle, in a test case of the New Haven Journal and Courier against four members of Typographical Union No. 47 of that city.

The trial of Cleary, the fourth of the members of the New York Board of Aldermen in 1884 who have been indicted for bribe-taking, is proceeding. Jaehne, McQuade, and O'Neil have been convicted and sentenced to hard labor in prison and to pay fines. Judge Barnard has denied the motion of O'Neil's counsel for further stay of the execution of his sentence pending appeal.

There have been heavy snowfalls both in the Northwest and in the Northeast. On the 24th the severest storm of the winter was reported from Nebraska, and on the following day trains had to be abandoned in Minnesota. In Vermont, New Hampshire, and northern New York the railroads were blockaded; and the mountains of southwestern Virginia were deeply covered.

A successful test of a new steam-heating apparatus was made on Friday in passenger cars on the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad between St. Paul and Minneapolis. The device consists of the use of the exhaust steam from the dome of the engine, carried through pipes underneath the engine and cars, with a flexible coupling between each car. The thermometer registered 80° inside the cars when outside it stood at zero. The heat was distributed equitably, and seemed to be devoid of the dryness which is usual in coaches heated by stoves.

The season of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera-house in this city closed last week. Herr Seidl, the conductor, received from fifty or more patrons of the opera a "loving-cup," valued at $1,000, which, in point of design and artistic finish, is said to excel anything ever made in this country.

Commodore William T. Truxton, United States Navy, retired, died at Norfolk, Va., on February 25. He was born in Pennsylvania on March 11, 1824, and had served forty-six years in the navy, nearly twenty-two of which were spent at sea. He commanded the sloop Dale in the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron in 1862, the steam gunboats Chocura and Tacony of the North Atlantic Blockading Squadron in 1863–65; and he took part in the capture of Plymouth, N. C., in 1864, in the two attacks on Fort Fisher. Gen. Thomas W. Egan died in this city on February 24. During the war eight horses were shot under him, and he was twice severely wounded. He was made a Brigadier-General in the Union Army and afterwards brevetted Major-General. After his retirement from the army in 1866 he served for many years as a deputy collector in the Custom-house in this city. Mr. Robert Livingston Cutting, for many years one of the best-known men in Wall Street and a very prominent man in New York society, died at his home in this city on Friday.

FOREIGN.

By the German election, which was held on February 21, the numbers of seats won by the several parties are: National Liberals 92, including 2 Liberals who favor the Septennate; Free Conservatives 28, Old Conservatives 78, Centrists 90, German Liberals 11, Social Democrats 6, Guelphs 2, Poles 15, Protesters from Alsace 15, and 1 Dane. There will be fifty-nine second ballots. Herr Bennigsen will not accept the Presidency of the Reichstag, but will keep the leadership. A sensation has been caused by the summoning of the new Reichstag for the 3d of March, before the undecided elections are settled by second ballots. The Liberals estimate that the second ballots will result in the return of 24 new German Liberals, 14 National Liberals, 6 Conservatives, 2 Free Conservatives, 7 Ultramontanes, and 8 Socialists. It is expected that the Septennate Bill will pass the three readings without debate; and apprehension has spread among the National Liberals that Bismarck will make more demands upon them in the way of tax measures than they will be able to yield. Herr Richter has declared that the elections were carried for the Government by deceptions and coercion of all sorts. The failure of the candidates favorable to the Government in Alsace-Lorraine has provoked somewhat jubilant comment in Paris. La Liberté said on the 26th: "It can now be plainly seen that a blunder was made when the provinces of Alsace-Lorraine—and more especially the latter—were annexed by Germany. It is apparent that it would have been better to have neutralized the provinces, as was suggested by sagacious minds during the negotiations between France and Germany after the war of 1870."

The German Government has issued an order for the dissolution of the union of Alsatian choral societies, it being suspected that the union has assisted the objects of the French League of Patriots. It is further reported that the laws dealing with societies will be rigorously enforced; that the measure forbidding French military men to stay in Alsace except on a special permit will be applied to civilians, and that societies whose rules forbid the admission of Germans to membership, or societies which, as a matter of common knowledge, exclude Germans, will be dissolved. Some law is considered necessary to deal with French emissaries—press correspondents and others—who, it is claimed, have been acting as electoral agents, inciting malcontents, freely visiting fortifications, and doing the work of spies. Advocates of an effective Germanization desire the temporary suspension of electoral rights in Alsace-Lorraine, German education in the primary schools, and a Government administration in place of the Municipal Councils.

There was much less talk of war in Europe for some time after the German election was held than before. It is reported from Berlin that the speech from the throne on the opening of the Reichstag, which will be read by Prince Bismarck, will contain a pacificatory passage. Negotiations have been satisfactorily concluded for a renewal of the alliance between Italy, Germany, and Austria, which will expire next May. The Austrian Government has decided to forego the usual spring mobilization of the artillery and cavalry, so as not to awaken alarm; and the North German Gazette asserts with emphasis that Germany has no interest in the East, and will not meddle in any quarrel which may arise there. The Austrian Reichsrath and Hungarian Diet, however, have by unanimous votes passed the extra credits asked by the Government for the equipment of the army and the Landwehr and the Landsturm; and two workmen employed on a railroad in Austria have been arrested as Russian spies. Gen. Boulanger said on the day after the German election: "When the ballot-boxes speak as they did yesterday, after fifteen years of occupation, one may well ask whether Alsace would not burst into revolt were Germany to declare war on France." French and German Government agents are visiting all the fairs in the north of England, and making large purchases of horses suitable for military purposes. Simply expressing his "personal opinion," Gen. Wolseley said on Saturday: "I should say I feel sure that a vast and appalling war is a certainty in the near future. But whether it will be this summer or next, there is only one man in Europe who knows—that is Bismarck."

The latest despatches report the international situation as less hopeful of peace. Although M. de Giers, in an interview with the Turkish Ambassador, expressed the opinion that the European equilibrium would soon be restored, and that there would be no war, the German authorities are greatly irritated by Russia's announced intention to increase her import dues, and are considering sharp counter measures. It is reported that incessant preparations are in progress in Poland. The forts are equipped with rapidly shooting guns, and the rolling-stock of the railroads is increased.

Owing to the war scare, German emigration to America has greatly increased, the emigrants coming chiefly from Hesse, Würtemberg, and Baden.

Among foreign personages who died during the week was Cardinal Jacobini, Pontifical Secretary of State (February 28). He was born at Albano in 1832. After holding less important ecclesiastical positions, he was made one of the "Consultors" of the Propaganda, and in 1874 he was chosen by Pius IX. as Nuncio at Vienna, which was at the time a position of no small difficulty. On September 19, 1879, he was created Cardinal, but he was kept for some time at the Austrian capital to carry on the negotiations with Germany and Russia, and to regulate the new ecclesiastical arrangements for Bosnia and Herzegovina. In 1880 he was recalled to Rome and appointed to the office of Papal Secretary of State, the duties of which so recently made him prominent, when he was called on to issue manifestoes to the bishops and clergy of Germany. The death was announced on the 25th of William Hensen, the German epigraphist, who was the associate in much of their work of Mommsen and Rossi, and was Secretary of the Institute of Archæological Correspondence. Richard Caulfield, the distinguished Irish archæologist, died on the 24th. He was editor of the Journal of the Royal Historical and Archæological Association of Ireland, the author of a number of archæological books, chiefly on Irish subjects, and a member of most of the European archæological societies.

It is reported that, in return for the Pope's recent friendship, Germany has consented to act as mediator between the Italian Government and the Vatican. The Vatican's proposal is that part of Rome, including the "Leonine city," shall become the absolute property of the Pope.

At a meeting of the Taxation Reform Association held at Berlin on Monday, a resolution was passed favoring the abolition or reduction under international treaties of bounties on sugar.

An earthquake did great damage to property in southern Europe on the morning of Feb. 23, and caused the death of more than 1,000 persons, most of them in the Italian provinces. The movement was from west to east, and the severest shock was of fifteen seconds duration. The area of the disturbance was from Nice to Genoa. Bajardo and Diano-Marina were the only places destroyed. Cervo was damaged. The Riviera was crowded with tourists and persons of distinction. When the first shock occurred, the streets of Nice were thronged with persons in ball room costumes returning from the carnival ball. The King of Italy, the Pope, and the French Government have sent money to aid the injured. On the 26th a slight shock was felt at Charleston, S. C.

Later despatches from the region shaken by the earthquake report that San Remo is deserted. At Bussana only a church steeple remains standing. At Bajardo 230 victims were buried in a common trench on Sunday. A gloomy feeling prevails among business people, who fear that the Riviera may never again be a health resort. A chasm has opened in the ground near Nice, from which a stream of hot muddy water bubbles up. Portions of the coast have sunk and other portions have risen. The building inspectors have condemned two-thirds of Mentone.

A rumor is credited in English political circles that an agreement has been more nearly reached between Gladstone, Hartington, Morley, Chamberlain, and Parnell than at any time since home rule came within the range of practical politics. The suggestion is even made of a possible reunion of Hartington and Gladstone in the event of the introduction of a coercion bill by the Conservatives.

Mrs. Gladstone presided on Friday over a meeting to form a Women's Liberal Federation. In her address she said that the women of Great Britain who were anxious to work for the Liberal cause and the progress of justice should be organized and united. Mr. Gladstone has made a permanent reduction of rent on the large farms at Hawarden.

The Right Hon. Henry Matthews, Secretary of State for Home Affairs, in a speech at Birmingham, intimated that Lord Randolph Churchill would rejoin the Government after the adoption of the budget.

The trial at Dublin of Messrs. Dillon, O'Brien, Redmond, and other Irishmen for their connection with the "plan of campaign" was concluded on February 24 by a disagreement of the jury. They will be tried again in April.

The report of the Royal Commission on the Irish land question has been made to the House of Commons. The chief recommendations are (1) that the term of judicial rents, fixed by the Land Act at fifteen years, be reduced to the statutory term of five years, all whose rents were fixed five years ago having the right to go into court at once for a revision of their rents; (2) that all leaseholders be permitted to go into court and have the judicial rent fixed by the Land Commissioners. The Commissioners report that intimidation in the shape of boycotting prevails extensively, but they abstain from making any recommendations on the subject. As to the congested districts, they recommend that the excessive population on the western seaboard should be reduced by migration or emigration.

The House of Commons has busied itself with a discussion of the rules of procedure. Mr. Parnell moved the exemption from closure of measures increasing the stringency of the criminal law in Ireland. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach declared emphatically that the Government declined to entertain such a proposal. Mr. Parnell said that unless such an amendment were adopted, the power would be given to any minister commanding a majority to carry the second reading of a coercion act without a word of protest from the Irish. The motion was rejected by a vote of 264 to 155. Subsequently Mr. Parnell moved the exemption from closure of all proceedings in committee of supply, which also was defeated. During the general debate on closure Mr. T. R. Buchanan (Liberal Unionist), Member for West Edinburgh, said that in the United States Congress moving the previous question was much used to close debate. This was done regardless of the Speaker's approval, the Americans acting in the belief that the Speaker's wishes should be left out of consideration in such cases. He strongly favored the adoption of the American form of closure. Mr. R. T. Reed (Liberal), member for Dumfries, advocated the American plan of devolving extensively upon committees the work of preparing legislation for final stages. This would greatly relieve the House, and do for it what no closure could possibly accomplish in removing the causes of breakdowns in Parliamentary work.

In the of House of Lords on Monday evening the Duke of Marlborough called attention to the currency question, urging a special consideration of the effects which the depreciation of gold, with the present difference in the exchange value of the rupee, may have on trade and agriculture in Great Britain. Lord Salisbury said that the Currency Commission would duly consider the subject, and Lord Salisbury's remarks indicated that the report of the Currency Commission will be against bimetallism and in favor of the gold standard, leaving the relations of the values of the two metals to the operation of economic laws.

A rumor gained currency in British political circles on Monday that the Cabinet had decided to prosecute Archbishop Croke for advocating the non-payment of taxes in Ireland. In the House of Commons Mr. William Johnston, the Orange leader, asked Sir Michael Hicks-Beach what the Government intended to do regarding the Archbishop. Sir Michael declined to say more than that the question was engaging the attention of the Government. The Dublin executive has authorized all local magistrates to proclaim every Plan of Campaign meeting, and to demand the assistance of the military and police without awaiting sanction from headquarters. Mr. David Sheehy, member of Parliament for South Galway, will be removed from the office of Sheriff of Limerick for presiding at Plan of Campaign meetings.

In the House of Commons on March 1, Mr. George Howell, advanced Liberal, asserted that members of the corporation of London had diverted large sums of public money to defeat the bill before Parliament for the reform of the London Government, and asked for the appointment of a committee of inquiry. Mr. Gladstone declared that the matter was of the greatest importance, and that an inquiry must be granted, in order to prove whether or not the greatest corporation in the country had misused its trust and adopted illegal methods to pervert public opinion or control legislative action. Mr. W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, without admitting the truth of the accusation, assented to the appointment of a committee of inquiry.

There was a parade of Socialists in London on Sunday to St. Paul's, and the Cathedral was packed. When the text, "The rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all," was read, there were shouts of "Bravo" and other exclamations of approval and some growls. But there was no other demonstration.

The 21st day of June has been decided upon as the date for the national celebration of the Queen's jubilee. The day will be declared a holiday, and her Majesty will attend a state service to be held in Westminster Abbey.

Diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Venezuela have been suspended, owing to a dispute respecting the frontier line between that country and British Guiana.

Mr. Stanley set out from Zanzibar on February 24, having fitted out an expedition, and has proceeded on his mission to rescue Emin Bey. The expedition consists of 9 European officers, 61 Sudanese, 13 Somalis, 620 natives of Zanzibar, 3 interpreters, and an Arab trader and 40 of his followers. Couriers have gone overland with letters to Uganda, and others have been sent to Stanley Falls to meet the native chiefs.

The Spanish Government is trying to induce Republicans abroad to return to Spain and accept amnesty, the object being to put a stop to revolutionary propaganda.

Experiments with a new explosive which have been made under the supervision of the Russian Government have been attended with great success. The explosive possesses fifteen times greater destructive power than gunpowder, and it does not produce any smoke.

Prince Alexander of Battenberg, the deposed King of Bulgaria, is ill at his father's house in Darmstadt, with varioloid.

A well of fine petroleum has been discovered in Houdeng-Goegnies in Belgium.

The recent elections in New South Wales resulted in the return to the Legislative Assembly of 83 free-traders and 41 protectionists.

THE MONEY POWER IN POLITICS.

THE figures which the City Chamberlain, Mr. William M. Ivins, gave before the Commonwealth Club on Monday, showing the amount of money which, in various ways, enters into our municipal elections, were startling chiefly because of their exactness. It has been notorious for years that enormous sums were spent in this way, and that a large part of them came from assessments upon candidates, but until now we have not had the exact figures. Mr. Ivins says he has devoted fifteen years to the subject, and as he has had the great advantage of prosecuting his inquiries from the inside, we presume there is no question of the accuracy of his results.

He gives first the amount which the city contributes directly to the cost of election machinery. This is to pay the officers who are on duty at the polls. There are 4,872 of these for the 812 election districts, and last November they were paid $222,500. To this should be added Federal expenditures for marshals, etc., amounting to $68,500, making $291,000. This is the city's direct tax. Its indirect tax is even larger. In every one of the twenty-four Assembly districts there are district leaders for each of the three factions or parties—County Democracy, Tammany, and Republican. Each of these seventy-two leaders has his election-district captains and workers. Many of these seventy-two Assembly-district leaders are always quartered upon the city in one way or another, and get as many of their subordinates quartered there as they possibly can. Last year these leaders drew from the city treasury in salaries $330,000, or an average of $4,750 each. This year they are receiving $242,000, divided between the three organizations as follows: 18 out of Tammany Hall's 24 leaders get $119,000; 17 out of the County Democracy's 24 leaders get $90,000; and 8 out of the Republican Machine's get $33,000. These amounts are in many cases subdivided among the election-district captains and workers. This $242,000 is the city's permanent investment in Machine leadership alone. To it Mr. Ivins adds $750,000 drawn in various ways for hangers-on and heelers, making a total annual expenditure by the city for "politics" of $992,000. Adding to this the total for the legal machinery of elections, $291,000, we have as a grand total of the taxpayers' money involved in an ordinary city election, $1,283,000. For a Presidential election, Mr. Ivins estimates an increase of at least $100,000 in the expenditure for legal machinery.

Turning now to the assessment question, it appears that the income from candidates alone is almost as large as the city's expenditure for legal machinery. Mr. Ivins gives the following as the usual tariff on candidates:

Candidate.	Total assessment.
Mayor (for three Machines)	$25,000 to $30,000
Supreme Judge (for two or more Machines)	10,000 to 20,000
Superior Judge (for two or more Machines)	10,000 to 15,000
Common Pleas (for two or more Machines)	10,000 to 15,000
Register	15,000 to 40,000
Comptroller	10,000
Sheriff	10,000
County Clerk	10,000
District Attorney	5,000
Congress	5,000 to 10,000
State Senator	5,000 to 10,000
Assembly	500 to 1,000

As there are almost always two candidates for each office, and sometimes three, the total assessments are often double the figures represented above. For an ordinary election, Mr. Ivins estimates the minimum assessment revenue as follows:

Two Aldermanic candidates at $15 an election district	$24,360
Two Assembly candidates at $10 an election district	16,240
Two Congressional or Senate candidates at $25 an election district	40,600
Four candidates for Judgeships at $10,000 each	40,000
Two candidates for Mayor at $20,000 each.	40,000
Two candidates for county officers at $10,000 each	20,000
Two candidates for Comptroller at $10,000 each	20,000
Two candidates for District Attorney at $5,000 each	10,000
Total	$211,200

Putting the average disbursements by all organizations at $307,000, with $100,000 paid by candidates, in addition to the payments by the organizations, and $291,000, the expenses under the laws, we have a total of more than $700,000. How this is divided up is shown by Mr. Ivins's figures of the number of men actually employed in the work at the polls. There are ten of them who are paid by law for each district, and about forty-six for each district who are paid by the political organizations. This makes for the whole city a total of 45,475 who are under pay on the day of election, and are consequently affected by the enormous amount of money involved. At the last election about 220,000 votes were cast, and of this number 45,000, or one-fifth, were receiving pay for their services.

Here we get a glimpse at the source of all our municipal misgovernment. It is well known, as Mr. Ivins points out, that all these district leaders, no matter what their political affiliations, are in cordial sympathy. They have all the same end in view, which is to get their living out of politics, and to make it as good a living as possible. The last thing in the world that they care for is economical and honest government. The more corrupt and extravagant it is, the more prosperous will be their condition. For this reason they are always ready to combine or "deal" for the election of the worst candidates and the defeat of the best, and they can almost always accomplish their purpose. A solid body of one-fifth of all the voters, actuated by a common purpose to make politics corrupt, is a menace to free government which cannot be disregarded. We are actually keeping under pay 20 per cent. of our voters, whose sole ambition is extravagant rule. Everybody knows the character of the vast majority of this 20 per cent. They are the worst element in our population, whose natural meeting-place is the liquor-saloon.

We have not space to-day to more than refer to the remedy for this, which is a complete reform in our election machinery. We may touch upon this hereafter, and also mention another item in the moving influence in elections, which Mr. Ivins did not elaborate—that is, the vast income at stake in the offices themselves.

THE LOVE OF TAXATION.

NOTHING could well seem more remarkable to a person acquainted with representative government only in theory, as it is laid down in books, than the attitude of many of the legislators of the State of New York towards their constituency. These men are never more disposed to be active than when there is apparently very little for them to do. They regard the prosperity of any portion of the community as an ominous condition demanding legislative investigation. Signs of increasing ease in the lives of the people do not suggest to them reflections upon the advantages of a mild and tolerant government, but stimulate them to devise new forms of taxation. The spectacle of millions taken from the earnings of industrious citizens and spent in maintaining criminals in idleness occasions them no concern; but the idea that any man should accumulate personal property without the interference of the tax-gatherer, excites them to frenzy. No talk of double taxation or of the diffusion of taxes will appease them; what they want is, that every "capitalist" shall be made to disclose the details of his private affairs. They seem to have the feeling of the Oriental despot when he discovers that one of his subjects is wealthier than he had suspected, and that he has neglected an opportunity for extortion. It is beyond question that many of our Assemblymen look upon this city with emotions like those which caused old Blücher's celebrated ejaculation when he beheld the wealth of London.

It is a fact very well known in certain quarters, although it would be almost impossible to produce the evidence for it, that the easy administration of the law for the taxation of personalty in this State has drawn hither an enormous amount of that class of property. It has led many persons of wealth to select this city as a place of residence (in spite of the fact that they often pay higher taxes in the form of rent than they would otherwise be subjected to), and it has caused a large quantity of money and securities to be actually deposited here. The violation by other States of the principle not to try to tax what can hide or run away, has increased both the population and the wealth of this State. The benefit, however, has in a measure extended to the whole country, for the existence of a great centre where evidences of debt are practically secure against governmental robbery, has lowered the general rate of interest. Every borrower in the land may be said to get somewhat better terms on account of the comparatively enlightened policy of the State of New York.

The policy of the neighboring State of Connecticut has been in several respects less judicious; but the shrewd inhabitants of that community are learning wisdom from experience. A commission appointed under a resolution of the General Assembly has been for some time considering their system of taxation, and has just rendered a most instructive report. Those who believe in the taxation of intangible property cannot possibly complain that the legislation of Connecticut has not been sufficiently stringent. It has provided at one time that all taxable property not listed should be confiscated; at others, that it should be taxed threefold or fourfold, or that like penalties of various degrees should be imposed; and the taxpayer has for many years been required to make his own return of all his possessions, and swear to the truth of it. In spite of all these measures, the proportion of personal property to real estate subject to taxation in Connecticut does not very greatly exceed that in New York. The owners of such property who do not change their residence, simply will not return it. This is no mere conjecture, but a fact established by evidence that is conclusive.

In the first place, it appears that in 1855 the amount of property in the shape of bonds, notes, and money at interest returned for taxation in the State was about nineteen million dollars. In 1885 it had sunk to about thirteen million dollars. The inhabitants of eighty-one towns do not own a single bond. Not a bond is to be found in the rich city of Meriden. The twenty thousand inhabitants of the thriving city of Waterbury, by their united efforts manage to scrape together only $750 in bonds. So far as cash is concerned, there was never a community since mankind emerged from a state of barter that got along with so little. On the first of October, 1885, the root of all evil had been entirely extirpated in forty-three towns, and the remainder got along with only $1,100,000, about one-tenth of the amount estimated by statisticians to be used by such a population.

If this evidence is not sufficiently cogent, it can be supplemented. An examination of the probate records, made by the Commissioners, revealed the interesting fact that people in Connecticut as a rule have no conception of their own riches. Executors find that their testators have been ignorant of the existence of from 40 to 80 per cent. of their real wealth. In one district, the search made included every estate probated during the last ten years, and was conducted with the aid of the Judge of Probate. "The amount of taxable property inventoried was $7,000,765; that appearing in the last tax-list of the deceased had been assessed at $1,581,-861." In another district, seventeen estates regarded as representative were selected. They were inventoried at $209,000; but they had been thought by their owners, when living, to be worth for purposes of taxation less than $47,000. It has been customary to accuse Connecticut Yankees of a certain smallness in their dealings, but when we consider how much poorer they are in their own judgment than in that of others, we see that it is easy to do them wrong.

When we consider the circumstances of beneficiaries under trusts created by will, widows, infant heirs, and such helpless folk, whose property is exposed to assessment through the probate records, we see that a man with due regard for posterity cannot properly die in Connecticut without carefully arranging his investments. If he should happen to be a resident of Hartford at the time of his death, holding say $100,000 in West Shore 4 per cent. bonds—which he would doubtless keep in a deposit-vault in the city of New York, and would omit to return for taxation—his representatives would find that the net return from this fund would be reduced by taxation to less than 2 per cent.—indeed, taking the census returns of the rate of taxation in Hartford for 1880, to less than 1 per cent. They must either submit to the confiscation of more than 50 per cent. of their income or change their residence. Without having any evidence upon this point, we venture to say that most of the notes and bonds that are taxed in Connecticut are in the hands of executors, trustees, and guardians who are unable to reinvest their funds. It is obvious that such persons must be often tempted to resort to investments of an illegal character.

It is not to be supposed that the inhabitants of Connecticut are of an exceptionally depraved character. Their nature is probably better rather than worse than ordinary human nature. They regard the present system of taxation as an exercise of brute force upon the part of the Government; that is, an outrage upon the rights of subjects. Doubtless many persons prefer to remove their residence from the State rather than to make sworn returns which, it must be confessed, require to be justified by somewhat elaborate casuistry; and citizens of this class no State can afford to lose. The great mass of the well-to-do, however, must remain where they are, and settle matters with their consciences as best they can. Probably they reason that as it is a fundamental principle in our criminal jurisprudence that a man shall not be compelled to testify against himself, so in taxation a compulsory oath is not binding. At all events they will not assist in what they consider to be a robbery of themselves, and in view of this fact the Connecticut Commissioners recommend that the State should abandon all attempts to levy taxes that produce little but loss of population and debauchery of conscience.

It is not to be expected that those rural statesmen who are endeavoring to establish inquisitorial methods of taxation in this State will pay much attention to the experience of Connecticut. With all their ingenuity, they will hardly be able to devise anything more stringent than some of the laws of that State. They will not succeed in adding much personal property to the list, but they may accomplish something in retarding the progress of New York. If they should succeed in introducing their policy, and if the people of Connecticut should at the same time adopt the report of their Commissioners, the advantages of a residence in the latter State would become obvious to a multitude of New Yorkers, whose expenditure would result in an addition to the value of Connecticut real estate much greater than the apparent loss in personal property. Such an exchange of policies would be an interesting occurrence, and one that the inhabitants of the respective States would regard with very different emotions.

THE NORMIROFKA.

It is not often that a real experiment can be made in political economy. As a general rule, when we attempt to try what the effect of a particular piece of legislation will be, we find it almost impossible to separate one cause from all other causes, and we consequently are apt to find the effect we are looking for mixed up with so many other effects that it has no value for us. The Russians have recently, however, performed an experiment in protection for native industry which is almost as neat and clean as a piece of work in a chemical laboratory. About forty years ago they determined to make their own sugar out of beet-root, the example of the French proving as fascinating to them as it has more recently to the Germans. At first the Government helped the manufacturers with a bounty. After a while—that is, in 1850—it substituted for the bounty a high protective duty on foreign imports. They began with three rubles on the pood—the ruble being about seventy cents of our money, and the pood about thirty-six pounds of our weights

There were slight variations made in the protection from time to time, but it on the whole proved prohibitory as regards imports. Under it the production of beets and sugar increased enormously for a great many years, and the profits were high. The large, well-managed factories made as much as 50 per cent.; the small and badly-managed, as much as 8 or 10 per cent. In 1881 the manufacturers produced just enough to meet the demands of the home market. From this the production increased with extraordinary rapidity, running up from 16,000,000 poods in 1881 to about 25,000,000 (estimated) in 1886-7. As the product of 1881 supplied the home markets, there was a surplus in 1882 and it steadily increased. Prices began to fall, and the small manufacturers began to fail. They could not export their surplus at a profit, because they could not compete in the foreign markets. More protection at home would do them no good, because the protection they had already was complete. Under these circumstances, there was nothing for it but to apply to the Government to pay them for exporting the surplus, and this the Government agreed to do.

An arrangement was made in July, 1882, by which they were to be paid a bounty of one ruble per pood for exporting 2,000,000 poods, and were to have also the excise duty of sixty-five copecks per pood remitted on this amount. This lasted until January 1, 1886, but it did not raise the price in the home markets, and so a prolongation of the bounty was demanded and accorded until July, 1886, on an unlimited exportation. At the same time the import duty was lowered to a ruble and a half per pood. Seven and a half million poods were accordingly poured into the English and Italian markets, the only large ones which had no sugar of their own. The influx knocked prices down in these markets to such a degree that it did not pay to export even with the aid of the bounty. Moreover, the quantity exported did not draw off all the surplus from the home markets. Three millions of poods of it still remained unsold and unsalable, every Russian having bought and consumed all the sugar he wanted or could afford.

Anybody who was not familiar with the history of protection or the workings of the protectionist mind would suppose that the Russian sugar men were now at the end of their resources; that they would sit down and submit to their ruin. They had had all the protection from foreign competition that they asked for. They had had all the bounty that would do them any good. They were cut off from the plan of making the Government buy their goods, which our silver men have found so successful, because sugar is too bulky and too perishable to be stored in great quantities, for an indefinite period, like silver. What, then, were they to do?

They called a convention to consider the situation, and determined to ask for something which has been making a great noise in Russian politics during the last six months, namely, the "normirofka." This remedy is simply the restriction of production by law, to whatever extent would be necessary to keep the price up to the point at which it stood when the manufacturers made just enough sugar to supply the home market. This price they called the normal price, and they asked the Government, therefore, to keep prices normal, or, in plain Russian, to give them the "normirofka." They said the normirofka would be good for everybody—the large manufacturers, the small ones, the refiners, and trade and commerce and agriculture generally. In short, it would "grease the wheels of industry," and fill both capital and labor with rejoicing. The scheme was presented to the Ministerial Council, and accepted by it, with some modifications, by a vote of 12 to 5. The production of every factory was to be so cut down for two years that the total product of the first year should not exceed 17,000,000 poods, of the second 20,000,000. Anybody might make as much sugar as he pleased, but he was not to be allowed to sell anything over the regulation amount. He might eat it, or store it, or export it, but not offer it in the home market.

At this point all looked smiling. But in the Russian Council the Emperor has the casting vote, and the side he votes on always has a majority, whatever the figures may say. So his vote, added to the minority of five, made it thirteen, and the normirofka was refused. Of course it would not have done much good, even if it had been granted. At the end of the two years the Government would have found itself saddled with all the beet farms and sugar factories in the country. There is nothing for the Russian sugar interest now but to crush out remorselessly all the weak, incompetent people who have been seduced into it by Government premiums, improve and cheapen the processes of production, and limit the quantity to the wants of home consumers. The loss and suffering of this remedy will of course be very great, but the experience is invaluable. No number of books or tracts could have taught people so much about the difficulty of living on the Government.

THE GERMAN OPERA SEASON.

THE third season of German Opera in New York has become a matter of history. In musical circles this will always be known as the "Tristan" year; and unless Herr Niemann can be reëngaged and a first-class substitute be found for Herr Seidl, it may be long before New Yorkers will be able to enjoy an equally perfect series of performances of the masterworks of dramatic music. It may be doubted if in the whole history of music in this country anything has ever been done approaching, in the perfection of all the details, the eight performances of "Tristan and Isolde" given at the Metropolitan this winter; and much of the credit for this is due to Manager Stanton for engaging six artists—Seidl, Niemann, Lehmann, Brandt, Fischer, and Robinson—who could not, perhaps, be excelled in their respective parts by other living artists.

The other novelties produced this year were not equally successful. Goldmark's "Merlin," although it was produced with a good cast and fine scenery, proved more of a failure than had been anticipated even by those who saw its lack of vitality at a first hearing. Yet it appears as if there were more in the score of "Merlin" than has been revealed to New Yorkers; for in Vienna, where "Merlin" was produced a few weeks sooner than in New York, it has since been given once a week regularly, and for a time seats were at a premium. At Hamburg, too, "Merlin" has just proved a success, the composer having made some cuts and alterations which might be adopted for our next season; for it will not do to drop Goldmark's opera altogether, in view of the limited scope of the modern repertory. That Brüll's "Golden Cross" was unsuccessful, is a fact which reflects great credit on the New York public. It is a most inane and trivial work, the extraordinary popularity of which in Germany a few years ago has always been a puzzle to us. Such operas can only be given, as they are abroad, at reduced prices. The ballet, "Vienna Waltzes," which accompanied this opera, though good enough in its way, was by no means placed on the stage with the luxurious pomp and scenic splendor that one sees at Paris or Vienna, and that alone will induce people to pay $4 for seeing what in smaller theatres can be witnessed for $1.50. In other words, ballet will not pay at the Metropolitan unless it is given on a scale of magnificence which no smaller theatre can rival.

If the dubious success of the fourth Metropolitan novelty—"Aïda"—did not justify the great outlay on its scenery, it must be remembered that the tenor Zobel did not please the public, and that, moreover, "Aïda" has never been the most popular of Verdi's operas in New York, even during the Italian stagioni of Mapleson's. As already intimated, the most successful production of the season has been Wagner's greatest work, "Tristan and Isolde," which had 8 performances. Then comes "Tannhäuser," with 6; "Prophète," "Meistersinger," "Merlin," "Rienzi," 5 each; "Walküre," "Lohengrin," "Faust," "Aïda," 4 each; "Fidelio," "Queen of Sheba," "Golden Cross," 3 each; "Masaniello," 2. Thus there were 61 performances, of which Wagner got 32. This is as it should be; for there are not a few who are convinced that if Wagner's eleven operas were placed in one scale and all other operas in the modern repertory in the other, the latter would rise up to the clouds.

This is not so extravagant a belief as it seems. The modern repertory is strangely limited. Mr. Stanton has produced fourteen operas in fifteen weeks; but even at an opera-house like that of Berlin, where a performance is given almost every evening throughout ten months, the list of operas is only about fifty; and this list includes some by Spohr, Kreutzer, and others that could hardly be given outside of Germany. The great demand for Wagnerian conductors in Germany—as instanced by the enticing of Herr Seidl away from us to Berlin—shows the drift of popular taste abroad; and for New York, too, the most important desideratum at present is a man, like Hans Richter or Mottl, who can produce the three remaining parts of the Nibelung Tetralogy in the same superb style in which "Die Walküre" and "Tristan" have been given to us. "Siegfried" will be the most important novelty for next season; and possibly "Die Götterdämmerung" will be added. Verdi's "Otello" also can hardly fail to find place in our repertory and be welcomed by the public. Nor will its performance present insuperable difficulties to a German company, inasmuch as, according to the testimony of such eminent critics as Filippi of the Milan Perseveranza, and Dr. Hueffer of the London Times, Verdi has in his latest work abandoned the traditional forms and methods of Italian opera, and cast it in a Wagnerian mould. It is hard for the Italianissimi to be forsaken by their own prophet!

Another opera in contemplation for next season is Weber's "Euryanthe." The Viennese wits, who called this work when it first appeared Ennuyante, were poor prophets, for it has already been sung over a hundred times in that city, and is appearing more and more frequently in the repertory of German opera-houses. Schumann called this opera "a chain of brilliant jewels from beginning to end—everything most clever and masterly," and Wagner even indulged in the emphatic assertion in one of his last essays, that "every single number is worth more than all the opera seria of Italy, France, and Judæa." One of Gluck's operas sumptuously placed on the stage would also doubtless be appreciated—witness the success of "Orpheus and Eurydice" as given by the National Opera Company. Schumann's "Genoveva" is worth considering, as is one of Spontini's operas, say "Cortez," although Spontini's musical poverty makes the success of his works doubtful, because it would be necessary to spend large sums on the scenery and costumes. The "Freischütz," in a becoming attire and with Berlioz's recitatives, is worth considering. Hoffman's "Armin" is vastly superior to the "Golden Cross." The repertory of the Paris Opéra includes two good works which claim consideration — Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." and Reyer's "Sigurd," a French Nibelung opera. It might be well to recall the fact, too, that Rubinstein's "Maccabees," with Frl. Brandt, used to be very popular in Berlin; nor is Rossini's "Tell" an antiquated work.

Excellent as the performances at the Metropolitan have been, they were by no means above criticism. The chorus was often poor, and apparently needed weeding and better material, as well as more careful drilling. Its performances in "Lohengrin" were repeatedly very bad. Indeed, "Lohengrin" sadly needs some improvements, as do "Die Walküre" and "Die Meistersinger." The only reason why "Tannhäuser" leads these superior works is because it is placed on the stage more in accordance with the composer's intentions. In the other works mentioned, Herr van Hell has shown himself so unable or unwilling to reproduce Wagner's intentions that the acquisition of a new stage manager seems an imperative necessity. But the greatest problem is the securing of a successor for Herr Seidl, whose contributions to the success of German opera can only be estimated by those who know how difficult Wagner's later scores are, and how impossible it is to reproduce them effectively unless all the performers are united by enthusiasm and the personal magnetism resulting from it. It will be pleasant news to many to hear that hope has not yet been abandoned of securing Herr Seidl for next season after all.

FIVE YEARS OF THE LAND LAW.

DUBLIN, February 14, 1887.

Now that the Land Law of 1881 has been in full operation for over five years, it is possible to take a general view of its effect on the country. A reform was wrung from English statesmen by the combined action of the people; but the reform accorded was not what was asked for, and was thrust upon Ireland in spite of the remonstrances of the Nationalist party. Even in 1881, Mr. A. M. Sullivan, speaking at Walsall, said the Irish people had made up its mind that there must be an end for ever of the landlord system. Mr. Parnell's apprehensions of the inadequacy of the Land Bill, even before it was mutilated first by the Commons and then by the Lords, have been fully justified. He said, on the 5th of May, 1881, in the House of Commons: "The bill will fail to secure for the tenant farmers of Ireland such reductions in their rents as to afford adequate protection for the property in their holdings acknowledged by the act of 1870 to belong to the occupiers. The measure affords no suitable guarantee that its operation will result in the establishment of a sufficient number of occupying owners to check the existing monopoly of land." On May 19 he said it was useless to try and establish a partnership between idleness and industry, and that the Land League doctrine was that any attempt to reconcile the respective interests of landlord and tenant was impossible. It is interesting to recall Mr. Cobden's denunciation, in 1849, of that oft-repeated fallacy that the interests of landlords and tenants are in the long run identical—a fallacy which seems to have possessed Mr. Gladstone till very lately. Mr. Cobden said: "As members of one community, I do not say that landlords and tenants have not common interests in good and equal laws; but as landlords and tenants their interests are antagonistic, for the interest of one is to rent the land as cheap as he can, and the interest of the other to let it as dear as he can."

Mr. Parnell foresaw very clearly the weakness of the rent provisions of the Land Law. He said: "The tenant is not afforded the simple means of knowing what is his except by tedious and expensive litigation, every step in which may be contested by the rich, powerful, and educated landlord class opposed to him. It will be impossible to find an unprejudiced tribunal; the educated classes, from whom the sub-commissioners will be drawn, will be either landlords themselves or their relations, or in some way under their influence, and in favor of the maintenance of the landlord system in its full integrity." Finally, he warned the Government that there was no better way of keeping alive agitation than by supplying half remedies for admitted grievances. The agitation is still as living and forcible as in 1881, and again there is the danger of half remedies. A legislature constituted as the Imperial Parliament is, and occupied with the affairs of an empire, is first ignorant of Irish questions, and, next, too much dominated by the powerful English landlord class to legislate impartially. It sees nothing in the agitation but a struggle between the "haves" and "have-nots," instead of, if I may quote the Nation in its own columns, that "the Irish people are striving after the American system, which has filled that country with happy rural homes, the nurseries of liberty which make the republic great and strong."

The Land Law of 1881 has done more morally than economically and materially for the Irish tenant farmers. There are about 600,000 agricultural holdings in Ireland, but as one farmer often has several farms—an acre or two, if let separately, being counted as a holding—there are, including laborers who are also tenants, less than 500,000 occupiers of agricultural land. There are not, however, 400,000 holdings to which the Land Law applies; for leaseholds, farms expressly let for grazing, town parks, and laborers' holdings are excluded. The expenditure by the occupiers of leaseholds, and of land adjoining towns and villages, and often of pasture lands, on permanent improvements, has been quite as large as that of other occupiers, and no real principle was satisfied by their exclusion from the scope of the law, which has therefore been capable of application to only two-thirds of the agricultural holdings in Ireland.

Nearly one-half of the holdings within the act have come under its operation, the number of rents settled by the different methods available being now nearly 200,000 (the former rental of these holdings having been £3,400,000). The reduction made by the operation of the law, of £600,000 or thereabouts, has been somewhat dearly bought. The cost of the Land Commission courts has in five years been over £300,000, an expense borne by English as well as Irish taxpayers; the expenses of the suitors in the land courts have been, at the lowest estimate, considerably over half a million pounds. The loss of time, the distraction from business, the natural tendency to bring the land into bad condition before entering the courts, represent large amounts, of which no exact estimate can be made.

The decisions of the courts, confirmed on appeal, and establishing principles which the Sub-Commission courts are bound to follow, have made the Land Law more useless as a remedy than even its opponents expected. The clause permitting leases, enforced by undue influence, to be annulled, has been inoperative, not because such a provision was unnecessary, but because of the technical interpretation put on its words. The Healy clause, intended to exempt from rent all improvements not made by the landlords, was in fact repealed by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Adams and Dunseath; a decision which was all the more unsatisfactory because it was against the opinion of the most eminent and most qualified judge in the case, Lord Chancellor Law, and also expressly against the clearly stated intention of Mr. Gladstone. The reduction made in such rents as have been revised is now admitted to have been inadequate; it did not even correspond to the fall in prices, and fell far short of restoring to the tenant his own improvements, on which he had been rented. The change that has come over public opinion during the last six months has been reflected in the recent decisions of the Sub-Commission courts, the percentage of whose reductions of rent has of late enormously increased. The result is a sudden and decided increase in the cases entered for hearing in the rent courts, showing that want of confidence was mainly the cause of tenants not entering before. In 1881 and 1882 the courts were overwhelmed with applications; but experience of the results, and the unexpected expenses attendant on rent suits, made tenants latterly more wary of rushing into court than they were at first. In the way of rent reduction, the Land Law has done nothing which might not otherwise have come about: the Plan of Campaign has effected quite as large a reduction in the rental of Ireland in a few months, and without cost.

From the landlords' standpoint the Land Law has been wholly unsatisfactory. The reduction in their rentals has not been compensated by a cessation of agitation; the tenure under the Land Law is too uncertain to induce tenants to improve more than they did before its existence, and to secure thereby the rent to the landlords; its effect is rather to encourage farmers to bring their land to its worst condition before entering the land court; and undoubtedly the Land Law has made landlords' estates quite unsalable. The Irish landlord has ceased to be an owner of land; he is now the owner of an uncertain and variable rent charge, accompanied by a liability to innumerable lawsuits. The saving clauses introduced into the law, in his supposed interest, have helped to make his property unmarketable. No one would buy an estate where the tenants were leaseholders. Their exclusion from the Land Law was admittedly unreasonable and unlikely to endure. For the same reason, the law having failed to fully protect and exempt from rent tenants' improvements, an element of uncertainty which was quite independent of economic conditions existed there also. The only person, then, to buy the landlord's estate is the tenant of each individual holding; and there competition does not come into play in fixing the price, but only considerations of what it is worth while to pay in commutation of the rent and the tenant's chances of still further reducing it. The conditions of the law, and the circumstances of most estates, are such that they cannot be sold in separate parcels; all must be sold together, or no part can be sold. The only influence compelling the tenants to buy at high prices is where the landlord has been able to offer the choice of eviction or purchase.

Landlords thus have good reason to complain of the effect of the Land Law; and their position is deserving of sympathy and pity. Many of them are not personally responsible for the condition of their estates, or for past injustice toward their tenantry; they have inherited difficulties, liabilities, debts, and misfortunes from which they cannot escape. Many a landlord would gladly sell his whole estate at a price which the tenants would willingly give, but he is trammelled at every point by the meshes of the law. Settlements, encumbrances, charges, and all the complications of real-property law prevent him from acting on his own responsibility or with vigor. He can take no step without incurring heavy legal costs; and delay may, and often does, mean ruin. It is surprising, after their experience of the disregard of their interests in English legislation, and looking at the general tone of the English democracy towards them, the Irish landlords do not attempt—as they might time after time have done—to make terms with the Irish Nationalist party, and to trust their own countrymen rather than to the chances of party politics in England.

The landlords who reside, and intend to continue residents, in Ireland are, however, as a body, enfeebled by the fact that so many landowners are absentees, without any interest in the country, and only anxious to realize what they can from their estates, and to sever the only tie they had with it, viz., that of rent receivers.

A LAND VALUER.

THE PRINCESSE DE LIGNE.

PARIS, February 10, 1887.

I DO not much like the title of a new book by M. Lucien Perey (the same who has usually collaborated with M. Gaston Maugras): 'Histoire d'une grande dame au xviii siècle.' It would have been enough to say 'La Princesse Hélène de Ligne.' There is some vulgarity in this "grande dame." It reminded me of a play which was once very famous, the "Tour de Nesle." The hero, a student named Buridan, describes some ladies whom he has seen, and says: "They have velvet dresses, oh! they are great ladies (ce sont de grandes dames); they have small pages, they are great ladies"; and, finally: "elles ont de mauvaises mœurs, ce sont de grandes dames." This was in the time of the Romantics; the "grande dame" of the "Tour de Nesle" was a Duchess of Burgundy, who threw her lovers from the windows of the Tower into the Seine.

M. Lucien Perey has chosen a heroine in a more civilized period; he has found the memoirs of the Princess Hélène de Ligne, begun when she was nine years old, and continued till she was married. These memoirs, the notes of a girl, were quite unknown; they are those of a clever child, at the time when she was getting her education at the convent of the Abbaye-aux-Bois. Who was this girl? One morning, in the year 1771, a carriage brought to the abbey three persons, the famous Mme. Geoffrin, the mother of the philosophers, as she was called, the Polish Prince Masalski, Bishop of Wilna, and his niece, Hélène, aged eight years. The Prince was in exile; it is needless here to say why he had fallen into disgrace. He had made Mme. Geoffrin's acquaintance during her journey in Poland, he knew she had a great influence over the King of Poland, and by her means he hoped to obtain an end to his exile. Mme. Geoffrin was not sorry to take a bishop under her protection, and she wrote immediately to King Stanislas August Poniatowski (her correspondence with the King has been published by M. Charles de Moüy).

What was she to do with his young niece? There were at the time only two fashionable convents, Penthemont (the chapel of which has become in our day a Protestant chapel) and the Abbaye-aux-Bois. Saint-Cyr was out of fashion: the pupils of this great establishment founded by Mme. de Maintenon were all poor daughters of noblemen. At the Abbaye-aux-Bois, all the ladies who directed the administration, and who conducted the education of the girls, belonged to the highest nobility. Music, dancing, painting, were taught with much care. The Abbey had a theatre with costumes and fine decorations. The young Princess was dressed in the uniform of the convent, entering the blue class, composed of children from seven to ten years old. The programme of her new life, written in her own handwriting, is this:

"On Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays: rise at seven in summer, in winter at half-past seven. To be at eight in the class, waiting for Mme. de Rochechouart, who enters at eight precisely. To learn, when she is gone, the 'Catechism of Montpellier' [this was a Jansenist catechism, as the ladies of the Abbey were openly attached to the Jansenist ideas]. At nine, breakfast; at half-past nine, mass. At ten, read till eleven. From eleven to half-past eleven, music lesson. From half-past eleven to twelve, drawing. From twelve to one, a lesson in geography and in history. At one, dinner and recreation till three. At three, lesson in writing and arithmetic till four. At four, dancing lesson till five; goûter and recreation till six. From six to seven, harp or piano. At seven, supper. At half-past nine, to bed."

The memoirs give us also a picture of the ladies who conducted the blue class: "Mme. de Montluc, called La Mère Quatre-Temps, mild, careful, too particular, and meddlesome. Mme. de Montbourcher, called Sainte-Macaire, good, silly, very plain, a believer in ghosts. Mme. de Fresnes, called Sainte-Bathild, ugly, good, telling many stories." Conventual life produces everywhere the same effects: things infinitesimal assume immense proportions, the instincts of human nature seem to take a new force, as you see plants develop more rapidly in a hot-house. Lafontaine said long ago, speaking of children: "Cet âge est sans pitié." The girls of the Abbey, though they belonged to the best families, were not an exception to this rule; they were often cruel in their plays, they delighted in tormenting their ladies and in tormenting each other.

The young Princess fell ill, and it was judged that she was too delicate for the ordinary course of education. It was agreed with her uncle that she should have an apartment of her own, with a bonne and a mie. A mie (an abbreviation of amie) is a little more than a maid, a sort of companion. A bonne is the word used for the maid of a small child. The Princess received four louis (eighty francs) every month for her small expenses. She had a banker and a large credit. The amusements of the recreation were very peculiar. The most popular was hunting. The red class (the older girls) chose the huntsmen, the valets de chiens, and elected among themselves a stag; the blue class furnished the dogs. The two classes entered into this amusement with much spirit, the girls imitating in their convent all they had heard of in their families. The amusements of the pensionnaires were often of the nature of practical jokes.

"Mademoiselle de Choiseul's room," says the author of the memoirs, "opened on mine. She got up at night and came to my bed; we put on our robes de chambre; we opened softly my door, and we ran through the house all night, amusing ourselves by blowing out the lamps, knocking at the doors, chatting with the novices, and eating with them sweetmeats, pies, and bonbons, which we bought secretly. One day we took a bottle of ink and threw it in the holy water, which is at the door of the choir; as the ladies said matins at two o'clock after midnight, and knew them by heart, there was no other light than a single lamp. They all took holy water, and did not see how they looked. But daylight came, at the end of the matins; so that, seeing each other so strangely spotted, they began to laugh so that the office was interrupted."

Another day we see her, with her friend, tying their handkerchiefs to the cords of the bells, so as to hinder the bells from ringing. Altogether the young Pole was extremely lively and unruly. She was intelligent also, and her style shows it. She tells very characteristic stories of her comrades: "At the time when Mademoiselle de Montmorency was only nine years old, Madame de Richelieu was abbess, and once became so angry with Mademoiselle de Montmorency that she told her, 'When I see you in such a state, I could kill you.' Mademoiselle de Montmorency replied, 'It would not be the first time that the Richelieus had been the executioners of the Montmorencys.'" This child, if she was not familiar with the history of France, knew well the history of her own family.

Sometimes a girl left the convent in order to be married. It was, of course, a great event. Mlle. de Bourbonne once came back from a visit to her family. She was very sad, and announced her marriage with the Count d'Avaux:

"The next day Mademoiselle de Bourbonne received a great bouquet, and in the afternoon M. d'Avaux came. We all found him, as he really was, abominable. When Mademoiselle de Bourbonne left the parloir, everybody said to her, 'Ah, my dear, how ugly your husband is! If I were you, I would not marry him. Oh, the unfortunate creature!' And she said, 'Ah, I will marry him, for papa wishes it; but I will never love him—that is a sure thing.' It was decided that she should see him no more till the day when she was to take her first Communion, so as not to be distracted. She took her first Communion at the end of eight days, and five days afterwards she was married in the chapel of the Hôtel d'Havré. She came back the same day to the convent; she received jewels, diamonds, and a magnificent corbeille. What most amused her was to be called by us all Madame d'Avaux. She told us that after the marriage ceremony there was a breakfast at her mother-in-law's; that her husband wanted to give her a kiss; that she cried and never would let him. Her mother-in-law told her she was a child. This great hatred went on increasing, and one day, when her husband asked for her at the parloir, she made believe that she had sprained her foot, so as not to go."

Many marriages were made in this fashion, and it is not much to be wondered at if they ended in some irregular liaison, as in the case of Mme. d'Avaux, who attached herself for life a few years afterwards to the Vicomte de Ségur, a younger brother of the Ambassador.

The custom of the Abbaye-aux-Bois was to confide to the girls the service of the obédiences. The obédience is the particular employment which in religious houses is attributed to each nun. There were eight of them: the abbatiale, the sacristie, the parloir (or drawing-room, where visits were received), the apothicairerie (the drug room), the linen room, the library, the dining-room, the kitchen, the communauté. Young Princess Hélène, after having played Esther in a gown covered with diamonds and pearls, put on a little black gown and prepared a tisane or cataplasms. The abbatiale was the service of the abbess; Mlle. de Choiseul did her errands, took care of her work, of her books. Other girls, bearing the greatest names in France, could be seen counting the linen and putting it in great piles, others took care of the priestly garments and mended them; some even had to look to the sweeping of the dortoirs. Altogether this was not a bad feature in the education of the Abbaye-aux-Bois; it acted somewhat as a corrective, and prepared the girls for the duties of a housekeeper.

The most intimate friend of our young Polish Princess was Mlle. de Choiseul, the niece of the famous minister. One fine day Mlle. de Choiseu was informed that she was going to marry her cousin, Choiseul-la-Baume; she was fourteen and he was seventeen. She fortunately knew him a little and liked him. It was a great affair in the convent. "Mlle. de Choiseul, whom I shal now call madame, came back from Chanteloup the seat of the Duc de Choiseul]. She told me of all the feasts which had been given to her, but said that her mother-in-law had scolded her every day." The Princess was very much attached also to one of the ladies, Mme. de Rochechouart. Her Memoirs end with the account of the death of this charming person. The remainder of the volume has been written with the help of the young Princess's correspondence and some notes, and of documents taken from many books. Her beauty was very great, and her reputation had extended beyond the walls of the convent. Two pretenders offered themselves, the Duc d'Elbeuf, Prince of Vaudemont (of the house of Lorraine), and the Comte de Lorraine. These were not accepted, and a third pretender came forward, the Prince Charles de Ligne. The house of Ligne is one of the most illustrious in the Low-Countries. Prince Charles, the father, was a great favorite at Versailles and Vienna, as well as at Brussels; he had great personal qualities, he was a good soldier, and a man of esprit. He was charmed with the Princess Hélène, more so than she was herself with his son. When she saw her future husband for the first time she told her friends: "He is blond, tall, he looks like his mother, who is very handsome, he has a grand air, but he is too serious and has something too German in him." The marriage took place in the chapel of the Abbey. The Bishop of Wilna gave his niece a trousseau of 300,000 francs; the presents were magnificent. Hélène gave a jewel to each of her companions. The contract was signed before the King and Queen at Versailles July 25, 1779. The day of the marriage (the 29th) Hélène was much admired for her "attitude pleine de sensibilité" ("sensibility" was the fashion). She went to her apartment, changed her gown, and went alone to the chapel, where she said a last prayer on the tomb of Mme. de Rochechouart, who had been a real mother to her. At the door of the Abbey a carriage with six post-horses was waiting for her; the postillions wore the pink and silver livery of the Lignes; she bade good-bye to all the companions of her childhood, and the carriage started rapidly for Belœil, the famous summer residence of the Prince of Ligne in Belgium.

Correspondence.

BISHOP COXE'S ENGLISH PHILOLOGY.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I shall now, I hope, be able to have done with the paper by Bishop Coxe to which I have already devoted two letters. His English, which is by no means exemplary, I leave uncriticised.

The Bishop expatiates on the misuse of the verb to demean, but gratuitously; his avowed subject being "Americanisms in England." And here again, as usual, he lays himself open to correction. Respecting to demean, in the sense of 'to debase,' besides saying that Webster quotes Thackeray for it, he gives, as from Webster, a passage in evidence that he "too readily licenses the vulgarism," and so on. In all this he confounds Webster's editors with Webster himself, who adduces no quotation under the word, neither approves nor disapproves it, and unaccountably describes it as "not used." Nor is he aware of the fact that Webster, who, he remarks, "mistakes the force of the word," as used on a single occasion by Shakspere, simply therein follows suit to Dr. Johnson. The validity of Johnson's view is questioned by his first editor, Archdeacon Todd, but is accepted by his second editor, Dr. Latham. The point is one for the conclusive decision of which it would be necessary for the poet to expound himself from beyond the Styx. Todd, in demurring to Johnson's position, as "dubious," and Bishop Coxe, in being absolutely positive—as I once was, myself—that it is untenable, may, or may not, be in the right. Todd shows, at all events, that Shakspere's contemporary, Dr. Geo. Abbot, who died Archbishop of Canterbury, undoubtedly connected to demean with mean, in 1601; and Dean Swift, as cited by Richardson, likewise did so. On looking over my notes I find that the objectionable use of to demean has been patronized by the Rev. Myles Davies, Dr. Doddridge, Samuel Richardson, Robert Lloyd, Goldsmith, Henry Brooke, Horace Walpole, Hazlitt, the first Lord Lytton, and the Saturday Review. The verb to bemean, 'to debase,' unknown to the dictionaries, is spoken of in my 'Recent Exemplifications,' etc., pp. 105, 106. Ventured, by Mr. Justice Rokeby, in 1688, it has since then often been printed.

Replying to the comment on the use of to demean in the sense of 'to debase,' that "it is not unusual," Bishop Coxe delivers himself in this wise: "What if it be 'not unusual,' so long as it is improper? It is not unusual for Americans, and Englishmen, also, to say talented, lengthy, being built, etc. But is nobody to stand up for the purity of our noble language because so many tendencies are at work for its rapid defilement and deterioration?" In dealing with the expressions thus frowned upon, and one other, I shall bring my special strictures to a close. As I have fully discussed all of them but riled in my 'Modern English,' which has been before the public for thirteen years and upwards, prolixity will, however, be unnecessary.

Talent having come to signify much the same as talents, there was no more irregularity in coining talented than there was in coining leisured or moneyed, which no one finds fault with. Not only so, but it might normally have been based on talents, if we had never had talent except so qualified as to indicate that a particular form of ability was intended by it; in which case it would have had companions in booted and spurred, featured, slippered, spectacled, etc., etc. So far as has been discovered, it was first used, though not exactly as we use it, by Archbishop Abbot—"an excellent writer," as Archdeacon Todd justly terms him—who died in 1633. Exceedingly few Englishmen, nice as they may be in their choice of diction, now scruple to employ the word.

With his habitual inexactness, Bishop Coxe arraigns the expression being built, without specifying the sort of context in which he takes it to be inadmissible. "Being built of stone, the house will last," or "the house's being built at once is insisted on," he would not condemn, though one might infer, from his neglecting to distinguish, that he would. Idioms like "the house is being built," as I pointed out ten years ago, were used in 1769 by Mrs. James Harris, and in 1779 by her learned husband, the author of 'Hermes.' When we had only, for example, "he notices" and "he is noticing," our language already excelled in one specialty of discrimination all other languages of Christendom that I know of; and we have improved on our old-fashioned phraseology by introducing the strictly analogical counterpart of "he is noticing," namely, "he is being noticed." The grammatical parallelism here contended for having been made out, beyond all dispute, elsewhere, I shall not here repeat myself. Suffice it to add that the modern rhematic development under consideration enjoys the practical sanction of, it is believed, nearly every living English author who is at all noteworthy.

For the characterization of the verb to rile or to roil, as a "local Americanism and provincial English," Bishop Coxe professes to copy literally from Webster, though neither Webster nor his editors so express themselves. It is worth mentioning, by the by, that Webster's participle roiling, with his appended estimate, that "This word is as legitimate as any in the language," is boldly omitted by those editors. To rile having originated here in England, why should any one fancy that the frequent use of it in our day by Englishmen is owing to a return of it from the United States? Anywhere in East Anglia this word, of yore no localism, may be heard every day; and what should have prevented its coming to be generally intelligible, like fad and to shunt, other provincial vocables which have, within not many years, become nationalized? The Bishop, quoting Forby from recollection, credits him with saying that it "is now seldom heard in England"; but Forby says nothing of the kind. He will have it, too, that the word is confined, in America, to "very illiterate people"; and he declares that he never heard it "among persons supposed to be educated." Either his memory must be strangely treacherous, or he can have mixed but little with his countrymen. The word, though not suitable for the pulpit, or for grave discourse, is a respectable enough colloquialism of the jocose order, wherever our language is spoken. As to the adjective rile, alike in Suffolk and in New England it bears the three senses of 'irascible,' 'vexed,' and 'turbid.' In some parts of Lincolnshire it signifies 'fuddled.'

I now come to lengthy, Bishop Coxe's bare mention of which stands alone in justifying the title of his essay. From health, stealth, wealth, and worth, which are, or were, both abstract and concrete, we have made adjectives. Why, then, should not we have made one from length, as well? The old longsome—which Richardson anachronistically speaks of as "our word"—was always depreciatory. So, almost always, is lengthy, which, as being much needed, has, and no wonder, firmly established itself, and is now avoided by no Englishman whose judgment has the slightest claim to deference. Yet Dr. Latham does not so much as recognize its existence. If all words of American parentage were evolutions equally legitimate, our verbal mintages would deserve no stigma. Webster's editors would trace it to England, quoting for it a passage which they attribute to Gibbon, the historian, and date in 1763. The passage is found in an anonymous translation, first published in 1837, from Gibbon's French. Though I stated this fact in 1873, those editors still persist in their error.

If the tironic and misleading prolusion which I must now take leave of had not emanated from a person who is presumed to weigh his utterances, and whose utterances will be received by many as authoritative, it would have been sheer waste of time and toil to expose its worthlessness. On essays of the same uncritical stamp good paper and ink are squandered, every month, by superficial speculators whose attitude, in approaching English philology, ought to be discipulary rather than magisterial. Abundance of reprehensible English deforms our current speech; but such speculators constantly direct their animadversions against illaudable locutions and laudable, indifferently. Where they all chiefly err is in repudiating the adjudications of usage, appeal from which, as common sense and the experience of the past should teach them, is of no use whatever. An expression offends them, and they imagine that they determine it to be censurable by asking, as Bishop Coxe asks, "What if it be 'not unusual,' so long as it is improper?" By a question to this effect there is implied the adoption of some standard or other of correctness, which, however, they evade formulating. Yet there is no difficulty in formulating it for them. Their own personal disapproval is, in most instances, the sum and substance of their arguments adverse to what they brand as to be rejected. They bring themselves to prefer what is old, because it is old, and to turn from what is new, because it is new. And hence their causeless wail, with the Bishop, in lamenting the danger of "the rapid defilement and deterioration" of our language. Of the assumption that it runs any risk of worsening, not a shadow of proof is producible. With respect to expanding our vocabulary, the spirit of the seventeenth century has revived in the nineteenth century. Verbal and significational novelties, good and bad, are daily propounded; and, just as has befallen their forerunners, it will fare with them, rigidly after their deserts. In conclusion, it would be idle to deny that, in proportion to slovenly practitioners of literature, there are more writers of careful English at present than ever were contemporary before. If English, in their handling, and as modified by the requirements of the age, is not as it once was, how could this result be helped, and what is the harm? Theologians, here and there, and the theologically minded, would have our language to be a curious branch of divine science, in which whatever emerged prior to a certain date accords with orthodoxy, whereas everything more recent in it is tainted with heterodoxy. The world has always ruled otherwise, and it will do so to the end.—Your obedient servant, F. Hall.

THE DERIVATION OF "SAUNTER."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Gilman's letter on the derivation of "saunter" moves me to inquire if those learned in such matters have weighed the possibility of its introduction from Spain. The dual signification of "santéro," i. e., "one who collects alms for a holy man or hermit," and "a hypocrite," together with the lazy life led by like hangers-on of the Church, may serve to render such a supposition plausible—at least on the surface.

OLD CLOTHES FOR THE FREE LIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Allow me to suggest a way of reducing the revenue, which appears to be growing too fast for our wants: Remove the duty on old clothes.

I have just had to pay, in Boston, $22 duty on a small trunk of old bonnets, dresses, and underclothing sent home from here. The articles were bought in America, and were worn there and here, and there was nothing new in the trunk. A consular certificate, costing $2, testified that my statement regarding the articles could be believed. But somebody had to be protected, and my protests were unheeded. P.

PAU, February 11, 1887.

A MUTUAL EXPLANATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am sure you will allow me to publish in your columns a partial defence of some of the errors you kindly pointed out in my translation of 'Eminent Authors of the Nineteenth Century,' by Dr. Georg Brandes, recently published by T. Y. Crowell & Co., Boston. Many of the slips may be accounted for by the distance between the publisher and the proof-reader. The proofs were all sent to me to be read. I kept them longer than would otherwise have been necessary because I wanted the author, Dr. Brandes, to look them over, but he was absent on his summer vacation. Thus it happened that the publishers, in order not to lose the fall trade, issued the first edition before the proof-sheets were returned to them. The second edition was published about the middle of December, if I am correctly informed, and in this I think you will find the most of the slips and errors of which you complain, removed. At all events, the proofs of the second edition (issued as stated before your valuable review appeared) were read both by the author, Dr. Brandes, and by me. I have not seen a copy of this second edition, but I flatter myself that you will find it tolerably free from errors.

Hoping you will kindly publish this explanation, and thanking you for the impartiality and thoroughness which invariably characterize your book reviews, I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

R. B. ANDERSON.

P.S.—You speak of my "long residence" in America as if I were a foreigner. Allow me to add that I was born in Wisconsin, and that I claim to be a full-fledged American, eligible to any office for which you may see fit to recommend me.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, COPENHAGEN, February 14, 1887.

Notes.

MACMILLAN & CO. expect to receive immediately from England Part 3 of that great Anglo-Saxon undertaking, the 'New English Dictionary,' edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray for the Philological Society, and printed at the Clarendon Press. This part concludes the letter B, and marks a sensible advance in the labor of publication, which, we are now informed, will proceed at a faster rate than hitherto. Part 3, we are told, "deals, in all, with 8,765 words, and the articles which it contains will be found to be replete with interest and instruction to every reader. It is a characteristic of the letter B (shared only by some letters of less compass toward the end of the alphabet), that a very small proportion of the words beginning with it are derived from or through Latin, the great majority being Teutonic, either of the native Old English stock, or of the accessions which this received from the kindred speech of the Norsemen. Hence the present part deals with many of the oldest and most interesting words of the language, which are also among its most important living elements in every-day use. . . . In the Etymology, much more original work has had to be done than in the two preceding parts. The B-words are full of puzzles, which have baffled the efforts of all etymologists: every one of these has received a fresh and independent investigation, in which the editor has had the coöperation of the most eminent philologists of Europe, and the result has been the discovery of new facts or the elimination of old errors in the history of hundreds of words." We need hardly remind our readers that this work ought to be not only in "every gentleman's library," but in every intelligent household.

Macmillan & Co. will be the English publishers of Prof. Mendenhall's 'A Century of Electricity,' and, in order to secure simultaneous publication, its issue here by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will be postponed.

Harper & Bros. have nearly ready, bound in book form, Mr. H. Rider Haggard's 'Jess'; also, 'Haifa, or Life in Modern Palestine,' by Laurence Oliphant; 'From the Forecastle to the Cabin,' by Capt. Samuel Samuels of the yacht Dauntless; and 'Microscopy for Beginners,' by Dr. Alfred C. Stokes of Trenton, New Jersey.

A. C. Armstrong & Son will publish during March 'Modern Methods of Illustrating Books,' by H. J. Wood; 'The Dedication of Books to Patron and Friend,' by Henry B. Wheatley; 'A History of the Old English Letter Foundries'; 'The Life and Poems of Mme. La Guyon,' edited by the Rev. A. Saunder Dyer; 'Representative English Prose and Prose Writers,' by T. W. Hunt; and 'The City of Youth,' by J. Thain Davidson.

S. C. Griggs & Co., Chicago, have in press 'Masters of the Situation; or, Some Secrets of Success and Power,' by W. J. Tilley; 'Poetry and Philosophy of Goethe,' by Marion V. Dudley; and 'Theophilus Trent; or, Old Times in the Oak Openings,' by Dr. B. F. Taylor.

Ginn & Co. have nearly ready Lotze's 'Outlines of Logic,' translated by Prof. Geo. T. Ladd of Yale.

Cassell & Co. project a limited édition de luxe of Messrs. Matthews and Hutton's 'Actors and Actresses of Great Britain,' in five volumes, large paper. They have also in press 'Yachts and Yachting,' by Capt. R. F. Coffin, illustrated by Fred. S. Cozzens.

The New York Shakspere Society will shortly complete with Part 2 its 'Digesta Shakespeareana,' or topical index to the entire body of Shakspere literature to January 1, 1887. Hereafter the Society will regularly issue a Year-book which will continue the index for the twelvemonth.

The twentieth annual issue of 'Poor's Manual of the Railroads of the United States' will be ready about July 1.

The 'Life of Abraham Lincoln,' by Francis F. Browne (New York and St. Louis: N. D. Thompson Publishing Co., 1886), which has just been issued, is remarkable for the very liberal use made of the scissors in its compilation. It is meant to be a popular book, and is bulky; but the greater part of its seven hundred and more pages consists of extracts from previous works on Lincoln, supplemented by the most meagre and perfunctory of biographical narratives, a number of quotations from Lincoln's speeches, and illustrations of an inferior and sometimes painfully sensational nature. It is, in fact, a selection of the most striking anecdotes and scenes of Lincoln's life, arranged chronologically, and taken, wherever they might be found, from books old and new. It contributes practically nothing to the subject. The examination of the sources, however, has been thorough, and the information given is very full. It is necessarily a strictly personal life, and the hard and grim lines of Lincoln's career are very strongly brought out.

Matthew Arnold's "Estimate" of Gen. Grant has been reprinted from Murray's Magazine by Cupples, Upham & Co., Boston.

Mr. William J. Rolfe has edited, in his usual careful and thorough manner, Scott's 'Lay of the Last Minstrel' (Boston: Ticknor & Co.). Scott's two introductions are quoted entire. In that of 1830, his obligations to Coleridge's "Christabel" for a hint as to metres are acknowledged. There was a chance here for Mr. Rolfe to annotate by citing Coleridge's dictum (in his 'Table-Talk'): "Not twenty lines of Scott's poetry will ever reach posterity: it has relation to nothing."

Mr. E. H. Hall, instructor in physics in Harvard College, is the author of a pamphlet of 37 pages on the 'Elementary Ideas, Definitions, and Laws in Dynamics' (Cambridge: Charles W. Sever). So much of mathematics and physics as is taught in any high school or academy which prepares boys for college is all that is necessary to the perusal of the little book. It will, however, be most interesting to those who have something of a metaphysical cast of mind, and are fond of reflecting upon or discussing those elementary ideas which lie at the foundation of our knowledge of the outward world. The ideas of motion, velocity, weight, inertia, force, energy, etc., are discussed and illustrated. One of the principal uses of books of this kind is "to set the reader thinking." He may not have the difficulties which present themselves to his mind satisfactorily disposed of, but it is a long step in advance to see clearly what they really are.

From Macmillan & Co. we have a treatise on the Differential Calculus, by Joseph Edwards, formerly Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. Though the author styles it an elementary treatise, it covers a great deal of ground, and is particularly full in its geometrical illustrations. The book does not seem to us well adapted to self-instruction, and will probably prove most interesting and profitable to those who have already some acquaintance with the science of which it treats. The copious selections of examples, many of which are new, and still more taken from college and university examination papers, and from papers in the India and home civil-service examinations and from the examinations at Woolwich, form, perhaps, the most attractive feature of the work.

The complete works of I. S. Aksakoff, the noted Slavophile publicist, conservative, and editor of Russia, comprising articles contributed to various publications between 1860 and 1886, are now appearing in quick succession. Volume ii, on Slavophilism and Occidentalism, and Volume iii, on the Polish Question, have recently been published. The series is extremely interesting and important for the proper understanding of Russian public opinion during the transition epoch which it covers. The tendency of these volumes is in Mr. Aksakoff's usual vein, but they contain much with which people of other views can agree.

A thoughtful address by Mellen Chamberlain,

Librarian of the Boston Public Library, delivered at Brattleboro', Vt., on January 25, has been printed in pamphlet form. The occasion was the dedication of a free-library building, and the speaker contrasted the old life and social and political (aristocratic) forces of New England towns with their present comparatively disorganized and headless condition. "Henceforth persons will be of less account, and institutions of more account," and among the latter the public library will have a leading place. Speaking of the unliterary habit of the New England founders and of their successors for several generations, Judge Chamberlain repeated some curious statistics, of his gathering, concerning the advent of Shakspere and Milton to America —not till 1700 in Massachusetts, and Shakspere not reprinted in New England till 1802-1804. "The earliest quotation from Shakspere found in the series of Massachusetts Election Sermons is by Zabdiel Adams in 1782, and that is a misquotation."

Nos. 23, 24 of the Bibliographical Contributions of the Library of Harvard University consist of a list of the publications of the University and its officers, and of the chief publications on the University, by Wm. H. Tillinghast; and an Index to Reference Lists, by Wm. C. Lane.

In regard to the question of lending books from the Bodleian Library, a writer in the Spectator refers to the fact that the large Continental libraries constantly do this, but send the books or manuscripts to some library, to be used there only. This he believes to be the present rule of the Bodleian, in which case the chief risk run is that of the journey. In defence of the practice, he asserts that, but for such facilities to scholars, it would have been impossible to carry on the work of the Wyclif Society.

"The Unpublished Records of the City of London" is the title of a paper read on February 4 before the Royal Institution by Mr. Edwin Freshfield. He first called attention to the "Roll of the Hustings Court," containing every will relating to property requiring registry in London from 1250 to comparatively modern times, with information so clear and minute that a topographical map of the city at a certain date could be made "with the names of the owners of the houses and almost of the dwellers." In the records of the 130 parishes of London (mostly dating from the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth, though a few are older), he asserted, there were the materials for an unrivalled social history. They contained not only a history of the Poor Laws, of taxation, of sanitary and other regulations—a history of the governed, in fact—but it was also possible to determine from them where the people lived, the kind of houses they lived in, and their occupations, and very often, from casual references, to get an insight into their characters. He dwelt particularly on the light which is shed by them on the part played by the citizens in the civil war, the reasons why they declared for Parliament and afterwards for the Church and Restoration, and especially upon the extraordinarily personal rule of Cromwell. These things are made as plain, he said, "as if you could converse with the people who had written the minutes."

The February number of the Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society opens with a paper on New Guinea by the Rev. J. Chalmers, for ten years a missionary to that island. The most interesting part is the description of a village of cannibals on the southeast coast. "Large and well built houses, with great figures in front painted on native cloth," stood on piles in a swamp covered at every high tide. In it was a temple consisting of an enclosure with a roof supported at one end by posts eighty feet high, and approached by an aisle nearly 200 feet in length. This was hung on either side "with what looked like splendid silk curtains . . . made from the young frond of the sago palm, split up when quite new. The flooring of the aisle, two feet broad, appeared to be a dark, stained, highly polished wood and carved with figures of men, crocodiles, and cassowaries; this was made from the skin of the sago palm, and received its high polish from the blood of victims dragged along to the end where the most sacred place was, and the constant tread of numerous feet." The skulls of the victims, inland natives, were hung about this enclosure. With much difficulty he obtained permission to enter the sanctuary, and found in it "six wicker-made gods with the mouth of a frog, enormously large and open, the body of a dugong measuring about nine feet in length and seven feet high." Dr. Edmund Naumann, for some years at the head of the Geological Survey of Japan, gives, in addition to a description of the physical features of that country, many entertaining sketches of the scenery and people of the mountain regions. In the north he says that the snow accumulates in enormous masses. "There are villages which frequently experience a fall of over twenty feet of snow." Naturally, during winter, nearly all out-door life ceases. In one village which he visited "the inhabitants, after their breakfast, go to the baths, which are fed by hot springs, and remain in them for the whole of the day, enjoying the heat."

The Revue Scientifique for February 5 contains an article by M. G. Marcel on the German colonies in Africa. He begins by quoting the saying of Bismarck that he "would not shed the blood of a single Pomeranian soldier for a colony," but does not attempt to show what has caused the great change in the Prince's policy. After dwelling upon the systematic way the Germans have proceeded in their colonizing schemes, by committees, societies, and publications, as well as by scientifically-conducted explorations, he briefly reviews the history of each colony, giving some trade statistics. The most important article, constituting two-thirds of the total exports to the west coast, is spirits, principally rum, so adulterated as to have a frightful effect upon the health of the negroes. On the east coast he shows that Germany has acquired a strip of territory stretching over twenty-one degrees of latitude and reaching inland to the great lakes. This gives it the control of all the great trade-routes from this coast to the richest part of Central Africa. The article closes with congratulations to France on the possession of Madagascar, and advocates a more energetic policy in regard to strengthening her hold upon the island.

The new boundary of Brazil and Venezuela is mapped in No. 127 of the Journal of the Berlin Geographical Society. From Cucuhy, on the Rio Negro, the line follows a low line of hills westward to the headwaters of the Rio Memachi, and eastward the bolder and bolder serras to beyond the right branch of the Rio Branco. A plan of the ruins of Arsinoë (Krokodilopolis), by the explorer Schweinfurth, also accompanies this number.

The January number of the Annales de l'École Libre des Sciences Politiques (the first of the second year) contains five articles. The first, by Léon Aucoc, is entitled "De la limitation du rivage de la mer et de l'embouchure des fleuves et rivières." The second article, by André Lebon, "La Constitution allemande et l'hégémonie prussienne," gives a lucid and instructive sketch of the Constitution of the German Empire, especially the device by which the independent representation of each State is reconciled with the complete hegemony of Prussia. The third article, "Les vallées françaises de Piémont," by H. Gaidoz, is also of historical interest, treating of those French valleys and mountain regions (of which that of Aosta is the chief) which are under the Italian flag, and are survivals of the time when the little kingdom of Sardinia (then including Nice and Savoy) was almost equally French and Italian. The author, in his conclusion, takes occasion to protest against the excessive assertion of the doctrine of nationality—these fragments of Francia irredenta may balance what remains of Italia irredenta. Another historical article is "Les Congrégations Religieuses," by Émile Morlot. This gives a sketch of the history of these bodies from the time of the Revolution, ending with a recommendation that some limit should be placed upon their power of acquiring property in land, and that foreign associations of this character should be subjected to special conditions of authorization. The last article, by Paul Fuzier, treats of "La réorganization de l'impôt sur les terres en Italie" (the law of March 1, 1886).

The January number of the English Historical Review is a very interesting one. The first article, upon the Empress Theodora, by C. E. Mallet, shows, after a monograph by M. Debidour, that the commonly received notion of this princess, derived exclusively from the scandals of the 'Secret History' of Procopius, is improbable in itself and wholly inconsistent with the other works of Procopius, and with the other historians of the court of Justinian. An article by Miss A. M. F. Robinson, "Queen Elizabeth and the Valois Princes," contains a detailed account of the matrimonial negotiations of Elizabeth with Charles IX., Henry of Anjou, and Francis of Alençon successively. Of these princes, Anjou is described as the same contemptible and loathsome character with which we are familiar; for Charles IX. and for Alençon, "open and frank, valiant and manly," we are made to feel rather pity than disgust. The Queen's selfishness and vacillation are well exhibited, and plausible grounds are given for the assertion that "Queen Elizabeth, in reality, was responsible for the St. Bartholomew massacre." Miss Robinson is one of the best scholars in the history of the sixteenth century, and her article is a real contribution to our knowledge. "Early Explorations of America, Real and Imaginary," by A. R. Ropes, takes Winsor and Bancroft (H. H.) for text. The subjects especially treated are the character of Columbus, who, "though still the hero, is not so much the hero"; the birthplace of Sebastian Cabot (decided to be probably Venice); Vespucci, and Juan de Fuca. Another article, by H. G. Keene, gives an account of the Channel Islands. Among the "Notes and Documents," we have a vindication of the "Squire Papers," by W. Squire, and a defence, by W. S. Lilly, of his book on the Renaissance from a Catholic point of view, against Mr. Symonds's criticisms. Among the reviews we notice especially a caustic criticism of the third volume of Canon Dixon's 'History of the Church of England,' by the Rev. G. G. Perry. He pronounces the work "not sufficiently serious nor candid."

Among his many other duties, Prof. Henry Morley also edits The Old Neuwieder, the semi-annual magazine of the Society of Old Neuwieders and of pupils of other Moravian schools, 28 Finsbury Square, London, E. C. Of this pleasing little magazine No. 3 has just come to hand. It contains as introduction to the new year these cheering words of Prof. Morley: "A happy welcome to the New Year and to its work from the Society of Old Neuwieders. May we gather into fellowship this year many more comrades of all ages from the dear old schools. May God's blessing rest on this year's work of the Moravian Brethren, from whose example we learnt something of the meaning of the herald angels' song. May the spirit of their Brotherhood quicken ours, and make our common life as a Society helpful to us as members of it in our single lives; may it help, also, to maintain peace in us, and good will to all mankind. A happy welcome to the New Year, and its work in Christ towards the fuller brotherhood of man." Mr. Morley's description of the trip to "New Unkraut" (Neuwied on the Rhine), when but a lad of ten years, is full of humor. So is the story of his hunting the right Mynheer Van der Tabak among the seventeen Van der Tabaks at Rotterdam. It need not be added that this is a labor of love, and that gratitude for early impressions made upon Prof. Morley, while a boy at the Moravian school on the Rhine, prompts him to assume the editorship.

An admirable steel portrait of the late Edward L Youmans is prefixed to the March number of the Popular Science Monthly. His sister furnishes a sketch of his useful life.

Nos. 1 and 2 of volume ix. of the American Journal of Mathematics are before us. When the publication of the Journal was commenced the editors announced: "The publication of original investigations is the primary object of the journal"; and further, that foreign mathematicians of eminence would contribute to its pages. These declarations are carried out in a most remarkable manner in the present numbers. Of the 192 pages which they contain, 141 are due to the labors of eminent English mathematicians. On the "Theory of Reciprocants," Prof. Sylvester gives us fourteen new lectures (making so far twenty-four in all). They fill eighty-six pages and are "to be continued." A paper on "Wave Motion in Hydrodynamics," by A. G. Grunhill of Woolwich, England, occupies fifty-one pages, and Capt. MacMahon, R. A., has four pages of "Observations on the Generating Functions of the Theory of Invariants." American mathematicians fill up the remaining fifty-one pages. The profundity and originality of the contents of these two numbers are certainly unsurpassed by those of any mathematical journal in the world; but the ticket of entrance to the panorama of ideas which they exhibit can only be purchased by long years of labor.

L'Art for February 1 (Macmillan) is rich in examples of the pictorial treasures of Chantilly; in a noble etching, by Flameng, of Bonnat's portrait of his fellow-artist, M. Puvis de Chevannes; and in one of Ringel's medallions—the not very strong profile of the explorer Brazza. In the Courrier de l'Art for January 21, we read of a recent decipherment of the writing upon a letter held in the hand of Rembrandt's "Dr. Martin van Looten"—a portrait in Dorchester House. "Mon bien cher ami. Ayant trouvé guérison . . . Dieu vous garde." This is signed by Rembrandt's monogram, and the inference is that, at the inscribed date (January 11, 1632), the artist painted this portrait in gratitude for a cure wrought upon him by his sitter, within two years after his settling in Amsterdam.

A recent Assyriological thesis, part of a work on 'The Assyro-Babylonian Teaching concerning the Life after Death,' to be published by Hinrichs, is entitled "Die Höllenfahrt der Istar"—the descent of Istar into Hades—by Alfred Jeremias. This text has been translated several times, but Jeremias's translation is an improvement on those of Talbot, Schrader, and Oppert. The most interesting incident in the poem is the result of the absence of Istar (Aphrodite) from the earth—the cessation of all reproduction—a trace of this portion of the tale being preserved in the Talmud. The form of the poem, as the author well observes, is a parallellismus membrorum, the same as we find in Hebrew poetry. Another dissertation, by Carl F. Lehmann, is in Latin, and treats of a more original set of inscriptions, those which relate to Shamash-shum-ukîn, the vicaroy of Babylon and half-brother of Sardanapalus. Lehmann transliterates the Akkadian (or Proto-Babylonian, as he prefers to call it) text and the Semitic translation, besides a text of Sardanapalus bearing on the subject.

—The March Atlantic illustrates how easily this magazine leads the rest in literary distinction. Mr. Lowell has a poem of faultless handling; Dr. Holmes gives us the first instalment of his "Hundred Days'" campaign in the London season; and the other contributions, taken together, have the trait of style which shows a modicum, at least, of literary talent in opposition to facility with the pen. Where else would one find without surprise a study of a play of Euripides simply for its own sake? Mr. Lawton has described the "Hippolytos" in just this way; and, by the aid of liberal translations and not too much explanation of ancient usages and beliefs, he has made it quite intelligible and interesting, we should say, to the unclassical reader. He does not bring out the character of Phœdra or of Theseus, or the temper of the chorus, very clearly—for which, perhaps, more space would be needed; but Hippolytos, a very noble and beautiful figure, is perfectly rendered, and the way in which the single study is made to illustrate the genius and human nature of Euripides, is worthy of high praise. The author seems desirous only of adding his mite to the tribute which Euripides is receiving more and more from modern scholars, and of helping to relieve him from the invidious comparisons from which he suffers; to bring back a favorite of Milton is well worth attempting. Mr. Scudder's analysis of Longfellow's art is noticeable because of the clearness with which he brings out two things: one, Longfellow's ambition to leave a great work, of which 'Christus' and 'Michael Angelo' are the evidence; and, secondly, the large proportion of his work, aside from express translations, which is in reality closely dependent on his books for their matter. This is the first critical article on Longfellow which is helpful to a comprehensive judgment of him. Mr. Perkins's paper on Gautier is interesting, but somewhat lax according to our notions. "Paul Patoff" brings up in an English country house instead of Persia, and is some years older.

— Harper's begins with one of those solid articles, so bristling with facts and figures, which are really marvels of condensation and directness, and are most often found in this magazine. This time the subject reported upon is the Police Department of this city. The account of the system and its efficiency is very flattering to the corps, and the extent and variety of the service done throw a broad light on the modern government of a city. Next in popular interest, perhaps, is Theodore Child's description of French dueling, of the public opinion that sustains it, the general exercise in fencing, and the more famous duels of late years. Among the latter is Gambetta's, which is immortalized in American humor, but Mr. Child professes to give the true account for the first time, on the authority of Clémenceau, who acted as Gambetta's second. The rencontre, he says, was serious, and the distance not too great, but his defence necessarily provokes a smile. Mr. Child sees no indication of any change in the national pastime, and declares that its bloodlessness is one of its principal charms to the nation which is equally high-spirited and fond of this world. By far the most attractive article of this number is Mr. Charles Gayarré's recollections of life on the Boré plantation, on which he was brought up. It is a picture of early Louisiana life most admirably drawn, and with historical as well as personal interest. The old man, his grandfather, is a character not often to be met with on the printed page. The sketch is only too brief. It is much better to read than any current fiction, being full of a reality that refines and delights. The South is also made the field of a short piece by Mr. Warner, of the nature of a report upon his late trip with the Harper party. He confines himself to pointing out that there is no unfriendliness to the North in the suppression of the negro vote, but he looks on it, though with regret, as an exigency of the social situation; and he celebrates the educational and industrial progress in the cities, the general spirit of work everywhere, and seems to sum up his own view by asking whether, when so much more than was to be looked for has been and is still being accomplished, it is worth while to overturn the control.

—A popular discussion of the general nature of earthquakes and their geographical distribution, with special reference to the chances of their occurrence in this country, is contributed by Prof. Shaler to the current Scribner's. The subject is dealt with very comprehensively, and the various causes of the jars which are continually taking place in the earth's crust are stated so that one can easily understand the history of an earthquake in imagination; but the writer steers clear of particular applications. He suggests that the brief historic record of the seismic phenomena of this continent may be supplemented negatively by an examination of the distribution of the poised rocks deposited on the retreat of the glaciers, and also of the columnar rocks formed by erosion, or other unstableor fragile masses, on the ground that the regions where these are found may be presumed to have been free from shocks of any violence; and he argues, also, from the undisturbed surfaces of the glacial débris, found just above high-water mark along the Atlantic coast, from New Jersey northward, that no tidal waves have been rolled upon this shore. He points out once more the danger in our cities from the lofty buildings not securely joined to resist vibrations, and extracts some suggestions to architects from Prof. Milne's work. A second interesting scientific article is from the pen of Prof. William James upon the general topic of Instinct, but strictly limited to the phenomena of the subject. He disputes the theory of "derangements of the mental constitution" advanced by Romanes, to account for some variations from the normal, and thinks that such anomalies are to be referred to the transitoriness of certain instincts and to the inhibition of instincts by habits. The examples he cites are apt and his reasoning plain. He does away with the old antithesis of reason and instinct, and holds that the office of reason, in conduct, is not to inhibit any impulses, but to "make an inference which will set loose the impulse the other way." Man is thus distinguished from the brutes by the possession of more impulses, i. e., by a greater range of possible action; but they possess no principle of action which he lacks. This view has a very attractive simplicity and consistency. The Bayeux Tapestry is the subject of full illustration.

—The article entitled "The Late Crisis and the Coming Session," in the last number of the Edinburgh Review, contains a strong indication that English governmental methods are approximating to our own. Among other important changes in parliamentary procedure favorably reported by a select committee of the last Parliament were: 1, the division of the House of Commons into four standing committees of 160 members each, and the delegation of every bill, except money bills, to one of these standing committees; and, 2, the establishment of an effective closure. It is evident that the first change brings the rule of Parliament into line with Rule 10 of the House of Representatives. This change is very strongly advocated by Sir Henry Sumner Maine in his 'Popular Government' (pp. 336-240). The second proposed reform, to cut off debate by a two-thirds instead of a proportionate majority, is only a half-way house on the road to closure by a simple majority. A bill to amend the system of private-bill legislation, prepared by Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Raikes, Mr. John Morley, and others, amends that system in exactly the way that our own was amended in 1855 by X. Statutes at Large, 612. The bill proposes to establish a commission, similar to our Court of Claims, to examine and report on private bills. The means of making the procedure of this commission simple and inexpensive are only slightly different from our own. The character of the United States Court of Claims has since been altered by XII. Statutes at Large, 765; but the New York State Board of Claims, established by Laws of 1883, Cap. 285, and amended by Laws of 1884, Cap. 60, tallies in every respect with the commission proposed in the English bill, except that appeals from its decisions are permitted on questions of law when the amount of the claim involved exceeds $500.

—One of the most thorough, skilful, and entertaining pieces of work yet issued by the English Dialect Society is its new volume, 'Provincial Names and Folk-Lore of British Birds,' by the Rev. Charles Swainson (London: Trübner). The author is a member of the Folk-Lore Society, and has written a handbook of the weather branch of the general subject. Both societies have united in the present publication. The redbreast, nightingale, wren, swallow, magpie, crow, rook and raven, woodpecker, and cuckoo (the last especially), are richest on the side of folk-lore, alias popular superstition. It is hard to realize that the reputation of these birds (often contradictory in different countries or localities, as in the case of the swallow, which is generally the friend of man, but among the Celts is regarded as diabolical) is firmly believed in at this moment by populations supposed to be both civilized and Christian. In 1860 a cormorant, perching of a Sunday on Boston Church steeple, in Lincolnshire, excited forebodings speedily confirmed by the loss of a ship bearing 300 passengers, "amongst whom were Mr. Ingram, member for Boston, with his son, on the very morning when the bird was first seen." Some practices have outlived the superstition which gave birth to them, like the nailing of owls to barn doors (to avert lightning). The reason for burning the pigeon's feathers when making a pot-pie of this bird may likewise in time grow obsolete: it is to keep them from getting into a bed or pillow, and so making the occupant "die hard"—a topic lately touched on in these columns by a correspondent. Much curious information is conveyed in incidental discussions of proverbial sayings like "I have a crow to pluck with you," or "ducks and drakes" (the game of ricochet with stones on water). Under the Swan is told the story of Lohengrin; under the Partridge, that in some districts of France the weight of this bird as found on a given estate is considered "a fair standard test of the productiveness of the soil and of the state of agricultural skill"; under the Nightingale, that she sings by day also, and is "a very local bird, only partially distributed over England, being heard very rarely in Devon, never in Cornwall, neither in Scotland nor Ireland," though her habitat has no relation either to cowslips or to hops. Mr. Swainson draws his folk-lore from all quarters of the globe, including aboriginal North America. For literary purposes his glossary has a use illustrated in definitions of Spenser's "mavis [song thrush] with her whistell," Shakspere's "ousel cock [blackbird], so black of hue, With orange tawny bill," or Wordsworth's "burring dor hawk [nightjar]."

—The Moniteur des Intérêts Matériels of Brussels has, for sixteen years, been collecting statistics in regard to the issue of stocks and bonds of various kinds. The total issues of Europe and America for that period are stated at the enormous sum of twenty-one thousand million dollars. About half was used in refunding and retiring older loans, but, after all reductions, eleven thousand millions of new credit remains as a measure of the absorbing power of modern financial progress. The most significant thing about the figures for various years is their indication of the prevailing industrial condition. The vast credit issues of the time of excessive activity preceding 1873 is in striking contrast with the small emissions of the following period of reaction. The issues increase in the business revival of 1879, only to fall away again in the succeeding years of depression. In the words of Dr. Neumann-Spallart of Vienna (an investigator in the same field), it is from such tables of credit issues, rather than from any other sources, that we can best form judgments of the past and draw conclusions for the future. 1886 shows a continuation of business depression. Its issues, though exceeding those of the last four years, fell far short of those for 1879. They barely reached the average for the sixteen years from 1871 to 1886, though that time included a commercial crisis, two periods of depression, and but three or four years of full prosperity. The issues were, in 1886, $1,342,000,000; in 1879, $1,881,000,000; while for the whole period the average was $1,335,000,000. The only consoling figures are those for Great Britain. Not only were her four hundred millions of issues double those of France, the next highest country on the list, but three-quarters were for productive private enterprises, while in France three-quarters were for State loans. In Germany, Austria, Sweden, Holland, and Belgium practically the whole business activity was in the conversion of old credit rather than in the issue of new. The fresh impetus acquired by the English a year ago has been in striking contrast with the "modesty or impotence of the Continent." As the Moniteur concludes, the most optimistic observer can only say that 1886 has seen the dawn of business revival in the West, in the renewal of British enterprise which gives promise of extending across the Channel.

—American issues for 1886 were one hundred and sixty-five millions, one hundred and twenty-two millions being for State and municipal loans, and forty-three for industrial enterprises. This, of course, only represents new securities listed, and is small even for that. It was a total greater than that of any other country except France and Great Britain, but small in comparison with the four hundred and nineteen millions of the latter. The forty-three millions for private enterprise are especially insignificant beside the three hundred and four millions so applied by the English. On the other hand, American issues were three times as great as English in the ten years following 1871. In every year since 1879 they have fallen far below the average for the past sixteen years—three hundred and fifty-eight millions. The conclusion must be, if these statistics show anything, that America does not yet share the business revival now in progress in England.

—The Duc de Noailles and Victor Hugo, both born in 1802, died within a week of each other in May, 1885. The French Academy had opened its doors to the former in 1849, to Hugo eight years earlier. Their successors were elected upon the same day, January 11, more than a year ago. M. Leconte de Lisle, the poet, who will occupy the chair of Victor Hugo, will be received at the next public session of the Academy by M. Alexandre Dumas. The journalist, M. Édouard Hervé, who succeeds the Duc de Noailles, has just been received by M. Maxime Du Camp. This reception of February 10 was not a brilliant occasion. The new member pronounced the eulogium upon his predecessor in a quiet, sedate style, dwelling principally upon the only work of any importance of the Duc de Noailles, his Life of Mme. de Maintenon, and passing very rapidly over the rather uninteresting events of his political career. In his answer, M. Maxime Du Camp took no higher flight than that of the newly received member. He, too, spoke much of Mme. de Maintenon, so that it was cleverly said that from the addresses it might have been supposed that M. Hervé was succeeding Mme. de Maintenon herself rather than her historian. M. Maxime Du Camp has not a light hand, nor is his erudition sufficient to atone for a certain want of tact and taste displayed both in the blame and in the praise of which he is lavish. According to custom, he recounted the main phases of the life of the new member, addressing him personally the whole time in a way which could be gratifying only to a man of less solid qualities than those which have raised the successful journalist of the Orleans party to the rank of an Academician.

ADAMS'S EMANCIPATION OF MASSACHUSETTS.

The Emancipation of Massachusetts. By Brooks Adams. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887. Pp. 382.

ALTHOUGH Mr. Adams has not written a great book, he has done some service by his violent attack upon the received estimate of the founders of Massachusetts. Very possibly the filial reverence of recent historians has led them to excessive praise of the Puritans, and to an unfair attempt to palliate or deny the mistakes of our early colonists. If so, Mr. Adams has furnished their opponents with an impassioned recital of all the faults, real or imaginary, with which his ancestors have been charged. Filled with rage against the Puritan clergy as a class, he reiterates certain charges against them with tiresome monotony, and finally leaves the reader in utter darkness as to the object of the entire volume. 'The Emancipation of Massachusetts' is a catching title, but Mr. Adams fails to show from what she has been emancipated or by whom. His eleven chapters are, in effect, so many distinct essays on distinct subjects, connected only by his assumption that, in all these matters, the Puritan clergy were wrong and in most of them the clerical element was finally defeated. But these essays are very far from covering the whole period of the history of Massachusetts, even to the Revolution of 1776; and if everything he alleges were true, the reader would gain no idea of the real change in popular opinion from 1630 to 1770.

He starts with the idea that the first founders of the Massachusetts Colony came here with the intent of founding a Puritan State. This certainly is not a discovery made by Mr. Adams, as every previous historian was obliged to make the same statement. He proceeds to show that in so doing they exceeded their charter powers, especially in assuming to exercise the right to inflict capital punishment. Here again the charge is neither new nor important. Thousands of colonists, settled in a community so remote from the central power, could not be kept in order unless the right to inflict fines, imprisonment, and even death was conceded. The true question of interest is, Were the laws just and reasonable, and were they honestly and impartially administered?

To Mr. Adams's distorted vision everything seems wrong, because these laws contained, among other provisions, certain statutes directed against religious offences. Now it may be true that recent historians have been desirous of throwing a veil over this part of the history, but no one has denied the fact that religious persecution existed in the colony, and that it was a blot on the record. But the defence was and is always the same: the colonists were not much in advance of the generation in which they lived. It was a time when human life was of much less account than now; a period when the death penalty was inflicted for what we consider trivial offences. Stealing was in many instances a capital offence, begging and vagabondage were punishable by many stripes, long imprisonments, and even death. Religious differences, as the Puritans had experienced, were settled by the banishment or death of the weaker party. We cannot expect that, under these circumstances, settling in a wilderness to enjoy their own ideas of freedom, the colonists would be disposed to allow any greater amount of toleration than other communities gave.

Mr. Adams has retold the story of Mrs. Hutchinson, the Baptists, the Quakers, and the Witches, without throwing any new light on these subjects. He has simply written dashing essays on matters which had been worn threadbare, and the highest praise we can give him is that he has used the standard printed authorities. His two chapters on "Brattle Church" and "Harvard College" are amusing specimens of his ambition to deal with the "emancipation" theory, but they are only bits of history, unconnected with what precedes or follows. His main proposition is, that the Puritan clergy dominated Massachusetts from the start, that they defied the English authority, and fought against all attempts to liberalize thought or legislation, but that, in some mysterious way not herein shown, the colony and province was "emancipated" from their control.

We must repeat that there is nothing new in this idea. No one can read even the most meagre history of Massachusetts without learning two things: (1.) The colony was founded by men who exiled themselves to enjoy their own ideal of a Christian commonwealth. However gloomy, distorted, or unreasonable that ideal was, they asked no one to join in it but those who believed in it. If they prohibited all dissent, it was on the ground that the New World was open to other communities, and that they had bought this little corner at a great price. Even according to our modern ideas, they were right in this. They had banished themselves, they had parted with the conveniences of civilization, they had risked death in a strange land, all for the undisturbed enjoyment of their consciences. The Antinomian, the Baptist, or the Quaker was an intruder, as unwelcome and as inexcusable as a Bonapartist in France or a Nihilist in Russia to-day—or, rather, as unjustifiable as a Russian Nihilist is to-day in New York. In the second place, it is evident that in 1770 this community had developed into one of the most pronounced and decided in its democracy of any then existing. Kingcraft and priestcraft were both at a discount in a Boston town-meeting.

It would be impossible in the limits of a review to do justice to such a topic. Not only the ability of a Macaulay would be needed, but the space of one of his hundred-page essays, to traverse the ground, even with his powers of condensation. It may, however, be suggested that the "emancipation" was gradual, and that it was owing to general causes as much as local ones. A century only separates Cromwell from Chatham, but what a vast difference exists between the England of each. Another century brings us to Brougham, Gladstone, and Parnell, and a yet greater difference is apparent. But the world has moved as well as England, and the leaders are but the product of the times.

Undoubtedly the first generation of colonists must be considered narrow-minded in some respects. They had personally suffered persecution, and they were ready to retaliate. But even if there had been non-intercourse with the outside world, the unmeasured freedom of life here would have softened the tone of succeeding generations. However, it so happened that they had an almost unlimited intercourse also with the outside world. They dwelt on the seaboard, and they took to the water with more than the average English avidity. Their vessels swarmed in the Atlantic, and new ideas were brought home on every trip. Some writer will yet give us a history of this "emancipation," or rather of this growth of freedom in thought and action, but he will not follow the line laid out by Mr. Adams.

We are by no means sorry that this book has been written. It will command readers, and its excesses will provoke replies. To the student it will be an amusing curiosity, a proof both of the vigor of the Adams stock and of its inherited tendency to forcible utterances. It will also be accepted as a sign that too much leniency has been shown heretofore to Puritan faults and defects, and that the time has come for a readjustment. Mr. Adams has also started two or three novel propositions, as, for example, that it relieves the mind to call the Mathers and Cottons and Nortons "priests" instead of "ministers." This indeed gives us pause, for, if true, it opens a new mode of vituperation. Again, he holds that these "priests" got up the American Revolution solely from hatred of the threatened establishment of bishops, and deliberately abdicated their unchecked control of the laity rather than share it. This is ingenious, but it suggests the baneful effect of long-continued perusals of Peters's History. We are not sure, indeed, but that these indications promise even more entertaining volumes in the future from Mr. Adams's pen. Once relieved from even a nominal connection with facts, he might write about Massachusetts to our undying delight. Motley began with a novel and ended with a history. Adams has begun with history, but we discern the possibilities of a brilliant novelist in him. The time is propitious, for already the public has wearied of the domestic novel. The author of 'King Solomon's Mines' and 'She' is evidently the coming man. New England has as yet had few romancists to use her past history in the like manner. We see no reason to doubt Mr. Adams's success, however, in this direction, and we would urge him to consider whether this may not in reality be his true vocation.

Should he still persist in being an historian, we hope that he will pardon us for suggesting that every censure which he utters will be quoted more for its parentage than its truth. Peter Oliver's book, a generation ago, was similar to this in many respects, but it was quoted mainly by our enemies because it was written by one of Puritan stock. It may be that Massachusetts needs to be scourged, but it does not follow that an Adams should wield the rod.

OLIVER'S MADAGASCAR.

Madagascar: An Historical and Descriptive Account of the Island and its Former Dependencies. Compiled by Samuel Pasfield Oliver, F.S.A., F.R.G.S., late Captain R.A. New York: Macmillan & Co. 2 vols.

Captain Oliver modestly calls himself a compiler. To make a good compilation is in itself no slight task, but the two comprehensive volumes before us are much more than this. They form a veritable encyclopædia of Madagascar, its history, ethnology, government, industries, physical geography, natural history, sailing directions. Of the stores of information that lie scattered about in blue-books, diplomatic and consular reports, and official documents of all kinds, as well as in reviews, scientific journals, and monographs, nothing seems to have escaped Captain Oliver's searching investigation. His personal observation and experience, from the time of his visit to the island in 1862, as aide-de-camp to Gen. Johnstone, have been supplemented by the accounts of Ellis, Sibree, Richardson, and the other English missionaries, from which he has drawn freely, as well as from the richer and more varied French literature on the subject. Of course the colossal work of M. Grandidier, in twenty-eight quarto volumes, when it is finished, will be the principal mine of information relating to Madagascar, but it will form a library in itself, and will never be generally accessible. Moreover, in Malagasy affairs it is hardly safe to trust to French accounts alone, which are inclined to lay all the misfortunes of the island, most unwarrantably, at the door of la perfide Albion and the London Missionary Society.

Captain Oliver's work, though not colossal, is copious, and must forthwith become the indispensable hand-book for any one who wishes to study Madagascar. More than half of it is taken up with the history and political institutions of the island, or rather of the Hóvas, for, politically speaking, the Hóvas represent the island. Since the early part of the century, when they emerged from the condition of a subordinate population under the leadership of Radàma, the Egbert of Madagascar, they have asserted and, to a great extent, maintained their supremacy over the other tribes. Indeed, Radàma did much more for Imèrina than ever Egbert did for Wessex. Like Peter the Great, he was a despotic reformer. In his reign, says Captain Oliver—

"the alliance with the British Government, the suppression of the slave trade, and the adoption of a general system of education on European lines, together with the introduction of Christianity and its civilizing influences into the very heart of the country, combined to lay the foundations of a stable and well-constituted state. Then, again, the subjugation of a considerable portion of the island, the formation of a large native army disciplined on European model, the reduction of the language to grammatical order and written form, the introduction of the printing press, and the diffusion of numerous branches of art by the mechanics and artificers of the London Missionary Society, were events which gave a marked character to the period during which the Hóva kingdom was established under Radàma I."

The story of the political development of the Hóvas from this starting-point, as the dominant race in Madagascar, though told without any attempt at embellishment, is one of absorbing interest. During the long reign of Ranavàlona, the wife and successor of Radàma, there were many retrograde movements: the native superstitions were encouraged, Christians were persecuted, the entry of foreigners was checked, and the tribal wars were marked by the most barbarous atrocities. The young prince who succeeded to the throne in 1861, under the name of Radàma II., a sort of Malagasy Henri III., surrounded by a group of mignons, was unequal to the crisis, and, after two years of power, was assassinated with his favorites in the palace, a victim of court intrigues, partly religious and partly political. After his death a reaction set in, under Queen Rasohèrina. In 1864, Rainilaiàrivòny, a statesman of consummate ability and prudence, became Prime Minister, and since that time he has been the guiding spirit of the Hóvas. The two succeeding queens, Ranavàlona II. and Ranavàlona III., both women of high purpose and character, have served as a rallying-point for the loyalty of their subjects, and have encouraged and fostered their development; but the measures to which this development is due have been the work of the minister.

Capt. Oliver gives a large share of attention to the controversy of the last eight years with France. The history of this dispute is a repetition of the old story of European aggression in the East. Starting with frivolous complaints, it has been carefully worked up by agents of the kind which every European State seems to keep in its employ for purposes of colonial aggrandizement—men with the adroitness of a country attorney and the instincts of a border ruffian, who, by a combination of bullying and sharp practice, backed up by men-of-war, are enabled to wring concessions from a weak and unsophisticated people. The history of the French claims, the Malagasy mission to Europe, the bombardment of Tamatave, the insolence of M. Baudais and Admiral Pierre, the dragging on of the quasi-war through three years, ending with the negotiation of the treaty of 1886, by which France was at last extricated from her entanglements, is still fresh; but it may be studied again with profit in the light of Capt. Oliver's singularly impartial narrative. One thing is clear throughout, that, had it not been for the sagacious statesmanship of Rainilaiarivony, his firm and dignified attitude, and his skilful preparations for defence, Madagascar would now be a French possession. Throughout the whole trying period, the Hóvas under his influence have shown a moderation, a self-restraint, a disciplined obedience, and an inflexible resolution to preserve their territory, which augur well for their future. According to Admiral Gore-Jones, who visited the capital in 1881, they "are now in that condition that they are ready to burst into perfect civilization"; and there is little doubt that if the policy of Rainilaiarivony can be continued a few years longer, the Hóvas will have raised themselves to the condition, of which Radama laid the foundation, of a "stable and well constituted state."

In conclusion, Capt. Oliver says: "In spite of the gloomy forebodings indulged in by the press from time to time on both sides of the Channel, there seems absolutely to be no pretext for any renewal of active hostilities, and the final settlement of the diplomatic dispute is, at last, within a measurable distance. The story of the Franco-Malagasy war may therefore be regarded as finished." In the light of the narrative, and of the history of European encroachments in half-civilized countries, this seems a rather optimistic opinion. On account of the ambiguity of certain phrases in the treaty of 1886, the Hóva Government only consented to ratify it upon the definite assurances of an explanatory note signed by the French plenipotentiaries. How these assurances are regarded by the French Government may be gathered from what passed in the Committee of the Chamber of Deputies appointed to examine the treaty. When asked whether he considered himself bound by the supplementary engagement, M. de Freycinet answered, with refreshing candor, "No; I hold only by the treaty." The situation, therefore, contains the elements of a very pretty misunderstanding, whenever France is ready to take up her policy of aggression. For the moment, the Republic is too busy at home to engage in projects of this kind; but it will be strange indeed if, upon the first relaxation of the existing pressure, the attempt is not made to repeat the programmes of Tunis and Tonquin in the African island. A campaign against the Hóvas, however, will be no child's play, and the French Government must be prepared for a heavy sacrifice in men and money before it undertakes the annexation of Madagascar.

A MODERN ITALIAN SCULPTOR.

Thoughts on Art and Biographical Memoirs of Giovanni Dupré. Translated from the Italian by E. M. Peruzzi, with an introduction by W. W. Story. Boston: Roberts Bros. 1886.

Giovanni Dupré. By Henry Simmons Frieze. With two dialogues on art from the Italian of Augusto Conti. New York: Scribner & Welford. 1886.

MODERN Italian sculpture in the idealistic vein is of slight account, and it is not surprising that the reputation of its greatest and worst master, Canova, should have led to a reaction in taste, and developed a realistic art which, while it is technically the most facile and masterly of modern schools, is mainly so trivial that it is difficult to find its parallel in any other school or branch of art. The school of Tenerani and the classicists, following that of Canova, has disappeared from the lists, and the best work of to-day, in general, is that which compares, in motive and scope, with the French genre school, ranging from Bouguereau in marble to Manet in terracotta. Whenever the grand style is attempted it makes a fiasco, with the exception of now and then a portrait, where the subject lends itself to a realistic heroism.

Giovanni Dupré has the credit of being the leader in a movement which was a widespread and natural reaction from the inanity of the grand style, in the hands of men whose intellectual and moral constitution made them incapable of entertaining the motives of anything truly grand, and who mistook the generalization of true subjective art for the characterlessness of undiscriminating imitation. Canova and all his school and followers, near or remote, mistook the typical for the unindividual, and the academic art of the beginning of this century did little else than perpetuate this confusion. Dupré had the advantage of having no classical or literary education, and therefore no classical prejudices or tendencies, and he came up with the thoroughly practical views of a clever craftsman, who had no theories to contend with or be helped by; and when finally he was led by his irresistible individual feeling to a strict imitation of nature, and produced a piece of realistic sculpture such as had never before been seen, and was considered a violation of all the canons of art, he was assailed by the authoritative critics (always the last to apprehend the value of a novelty) as a vulgarian, and by the artists as attempting to pass off a cast from life for a true study from nature. It was easy for him to prove that his "Abel," the statue in question, was an honest study from life, and, having defeated his critics on that tack, the force of the alternate criticism as to its essentially non-artistic character was destroyed by the fallacy, then and still a common one, that what is like nature is good art; and the objection that the statue was too truthful to be done by the methods of honest art having been triumphantly overturned, the art of the work was considered by the trial to have been proved. The critics were nearer right. "Abel" was but a skilful piece of realism, only by the technical qualities of imitation and execution redeemed from vulgarism.

The difference between the realistic sculpture of Italy and that of other nations, our own and the English included, is that the temperament of the Italians is æsthetic: the love of the beautiful, the harmonious, the artistic, is a part of their character, and is developed by their beautiful surroundings—the art of their great schools all round them constituting a perpetual, even if unconscious, education. The art of Dupré can hardly be said to be more than the result of unimaginative and unintellectual study of nature under the influence of this temperament and these surroundings. Beginning as a wood-carver in childhood, sculpture became his habitual method of expression; being an Italian, his nature was moulded to the national suavity and good taste; and these accessories made the difference between his work and that of a sculptor like Hiram Powers, whose powers of execution and fidelity of imitation were of the same order, but who, lacking entirely the higher qualities of artistic susceptibility, produced statues which were realistic without taste, mastery, or knowledge of anatomy or action, and which remain simple vulgarisms, not redeemed, as were Dupré's, by any of the higher technical qualities.

The autobiography of an artist is, like all similar records, of an interest proportioned to its honesty and the genuine revelations of the character of the writer; and in these respects the present work is of a pathetic rather than artistic merit, because Dupré's nature was of a rare modesty and sincerity and (what is far rarer in Italian life) profound reverence. His ideas, except where they take plastic form, are in no wise remarkable, and the reader need never expect to get great light on the deeper problems of art, its philosophy, or its hidden sources. That he never comprehended even in his own art the fundamental distinctions which divide ideal from naturalistic sculpture, his discovery at Rome of a certain model shows:

"So it seems that without seeking for the cause of the contradiction between the living nature I had found in Florence and that which was represented in antique art, I had come to the conclusion that the Greeks and the Romans worked purely from ideas, and corrected nature according to that established rule which we call convention. Nothing is more erroneous than this notion, and the proof of it I found in Rome itself, as I will now tell."

He goes on to relate having met in the Trastevere a woman who reminded him of the Venus of Milo. "My dear reader, I do not exaggerate when I say that I seemed to look on the Venus of Milo." We need quote nothing more to show Dupré's total misapprehension of the principles of art. So far as his own art went, and the excellence of similar work, no doubt the critical capacity of such an artist is valid; but that Dupré had no clear conception of the higher elements of art is clear, first, from his having at that epoch, in the prime of his artistic life, no better conception of Greek art than is involved in his believing that the Greeks "corrected nature according to that established rule which we call convention," and in imagining that he saw the realization of the type of the Venus of Milo in any individual. A suggestion of the type certainly one may often see, but to say that "her head and neck, which alone were exposed to view, were as like that statue as two drops of water [are like each other]," is to show that he never looked carefully at the Venus of Milo or understood it.

To hope, therefore, to extract from Dupré's 'Thoughts on Art' anything to help us to solve the great problems, is to expect sunshine from cucumbers. He was not (as every executive artist has a right not to be) a thinker, and adds one more to the list of artistic arguments against the union of the synthetic and the analytic in one brain. If an artist can be a literary man, it is clear that he can only be so by sacrificing his artistic powers.

The translation of Mme. Peruzzi is, with here and there an exception, smooth, if not always idiomatic, English, but it has one of the worst faults a translation can have in the affectation of occasional transfers of Italian words to the English text, which is a clumsy way of showing the translator's familiarity with the original. Of the Life by Mr. Frieze, we can only say that its utter want of scale in judging its hero deprives it of the least value as art literature, and it has not the value, which the autobiography has, of the personal presence. When the author says that "we come now to the history of the 'Abel,' the masterpiece that brought the young sculptor suddenly before the world as one of the princes of art," we have the measure at once of his knowledge of art and of the absurdity of his estimate of Dupré's statue. Honest, manly, youthful study of nature it was, and such as a young man may well be glad to have done as exercise; but to call it a masterpiece is to confound language and prove the incompetence of the writer to pronounce judgment on any work of art. The rank assigned Dupré by the general public was such as the general public is competent to assign—in its own judgment—but the art of Dupré is far below that which may be seen any day in Florence left by the sculptors of the Renaissance; honest, prosaic, common-sense it is, and nothing beyond.

The dialogues which Mr. Frieze has been at the trouble of translating are poor stuff, and have not even the charm of being natural. They are the stilted and academic verbiage of an amateur recording the compliments he would pay to the sculptor, and the dicta of a sculptor whose intellectual education was so deficient that he never gets beyond the commonplace, and continually falls into theoretical absurdities which show his limitations even more clearly than do his statues. The autobiography, while of no use as art literature, has the charm of the outpourings of a naïf, simple-hearted, and pure-minded man with interesting experiences, but Mr. Frieze's biography is waste literature, and the "conversations" phenomenal rubbish.

RECENT FRENCH BOOKS.

'PÊCHEUR D'ISLANDE' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof), the last work of the author who writes under the name of Pierre Loti, has all the characteristic excellences of 'Mon Frère Yves,' which preceded it two or three years ago, and which came like a gust of salt sea air, fresh from the Breton coast, to Parisian readers of fine-spun pessimistic theories about commonplace people and events. Not that the characters in the present story, any more than those in the last one, are romantic or extraordinary. They are common Breton fisher folk, the young men and boys who go every spring to the Iceland fishing grounds, and the women, young and old, who wait for their return in the little group of scattered villages to which they all belong. The events, few and simple in themselves, are brought before the reader, rather than related, with a vividness and reality of which it is impossible to convey any idea to one who does not know this most real of idealists. The story is a series of dramatic scenes almost without dialogue, of pictures in which the painter's art does not come between the reality and the vision called up in the mind. The lives of the actors in the story pass before us with a surprising naturalness and simplicity, and yet with a certain reticence in the author that has a great charm. The book is nowhere spoilt by any attempt to say what is inexpressible in words, but rarely have words so simple, a manner so natural and unstudied, given such rich and complicated effects of poetic expression, or rendered with such pathetic beauty the simple lives they paint.

'Mon Frère Yves' marked a sudden development and deepening in the nature of the young writer, which is continued in 'Pêcheur d'Islande.' The explanation of this change is to be found in something besides the few added years of age since his first book was published, in 1879. Whoever is so fortunate as to have read, when still young, 'Mardi and a Voyage Thither,' and never to have removed the charm by a later reading, can have some idea of the land of dreamy enchantment into which 'Le Mariage de Loti' leads the reader. But if Herman Melville's almost forgotten South Sea stories offer some elements of comparison with the earlier work of the young lieutenant in the French navy who wrote this wonderful poem, in a language as simple and natural as prose, as picturesque and vivid as verse, what book in any language can be thought of to compare with the strange Senegambian idyl of the 'Roman d'un Spahi,' which came a little later, or the other works of the same period? The charm and delight of all these books is that they are the work of a man still very young, who has lived the life he pictures; who is evidently not a reader, and whose books are free from the echoes of other books; who is not a writer, in the sense that he follows none of the conventionalities of writing, and who gives the impression, if you ever think of examining the impression he makes upon you, that he is not writing for others, but for himself alone—not because he wishes to address an audience, but because he desires to note down what he sees taking place around him.

The author of 'Pêcheur d'Islande' and of 'Le Mariage de Loti,' whose real name is Julien Viaud, is a lieutenant in the French navy, most of whose life since boyhood has been spent at sea or in some of the naval stations in all parts of the world to which French men-of-war are sent. From the notes of his early years, with all the freshness of youth and reality about them, he wrote his first books, 'Aziyadé,' 'Le Mariage de Loti,' 'Le Roman d'un Spahi,' and the others. These are said to have been published, almost without change in many portions, from his letters and the journals, written from day to day, which he has kept. He says himself: "Je n'ai point même pris la peine de retoucher les lettres; elles sont là, brutales, ayant, pour ainsi dire, gardé le parfum de voyage, l'odeur de la mer." Some part of the surprising vividness and reality of his work is no doubt due to this instantaneous seizure of his youthful impressions in the strange tropical countries where so much of his life was passed in the comparative idleness of naval stations. The last few years have been very differently spent, in active service at the seat of war in Tonquin and the China seas, except a short interval when he was recalled in disgrace on account of a letter sent from there, which was published in the Figaro, containing a description of a battle in which he had taken part. This was considered by the authorities so cruelly realistic in its revelations of the savage feelings excited during a battle, as to deserve the punishment of a recall during active warfare. The punishment, however, lasted but a few months, and he was soon allowed to return to the command of his vessel. After this, in 1884 and 1885, he published, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, a series of articles which are among the most striking of his works. In these he conveys to the reader, in a way that is a continual surprise and delight, the impressions made upon him by the strange and ancient civilization and people around him, and the burning tropical lands and seas where even the odors were unfamiliar, and the light and air different elements from those he had been used to. It seems as if 'Mon Frère Yves' had been written in a state of reaction against these unsympathetic surroundings; and though 'Pêcheur d'Islande' was perhaps not begun until after the author's return to France early in 1886, it was conceived, at least, under the same influences, and completed while the repulsion against the regions he had left continued strong. In the spring of 1886 he was appointed to an important naval position at Rochefort, one of the great fortified ports of France. This was his native place; and at his home near the town, where he has since been living with his mother, he wrote 'Pêcheur d'Islande,' his best and most beautiful story.

'Madame Fuster' (Paris: Charpentier; Boston: Schoenhof) is one of the serious and powerful books of M. Ferdinand Fabre, recalling 'L'Abbé Tigrane' and 'Lucifer,' but not with all their great attractiveness. This is partly owing to the subject itself, partly also to the characters and their surroundings. M. Fabre has never been fortunate when he has gone outside of a purely ecclesiastical setting for his stories, except when he has taken a rustic one. The ways and feelings of people belonging to the world, of dwellers in cities, of whatever rank they may be, have not given him happy inspirations. 'Madame Fuster' is the minutely studied picture of a religious bigot, and of her influence upon her own family and all connected with it, and also of the influence exercised upon her and through her by the Ordre du Jugement-Dernier and its Superior, the reverend Father Phalippou. This Superior of the Jugement-Dernier and his subordinates, male and female, clerical and lay, and all those portions of the book in which any of them appear, are extremely well done, and as interesting as they are powerful. It is only the characters of a different class, with whom the reader should sympathize and in whom he should be interested, that leave him unmoved at times, and this is only when the Jugement-Dernier is withdrawn into the background. But the strong interest excited, except by the powerfully drawn Superior of the Order, is never a pleasant one. The harsh bigotry of Mme. Fuster has nothing spiritual or even human about it; it is not to religious feeling or even to the Church that she subordinates everything, it is to the Order in its most material sense, to securing for it the wealth of her husband, the general Baron Fuster. This motive of the whole Jugement-Dernier is kept in sight from the first pages of the book, and it gives to it a hardness and coldness perhaps necessary for the completeness of the picture which the author wished to present, yet causing the reader to regret 'L'Abbé Tigrane' and 'Lucifer,' with their tempestuous passions and lofty ambitions.

This new volume of M. Ferdinand Fabre cannot fail to recall two others published during the last few years. One is a scarcely known but powerful novel by M. Henry Maystre, a Protestant minister of Paris, called 'L'Adversaire' (Paris: Ollendorff; Boston: Schoenhof) published in a volume last spring, but contributed during the previous year to the Nouvelle Revue. It is the account, painful and realistic in its simplicity, of the ruin brought about in a little Protestant congregation of the south of France by the appearance and influence there of the Salvation Army. The other is 'L'Évangéliste' of M. Alphonse Daudet (Paris: Dentu, 1883), in which the resemblances to M. Fabre's story rather than the contrasts, as in the last work, are striking. It is impossible, in reading the volume just issued, not to compare it with the brilliant narrative of the picturesque Daudet. But if any of the three writers owes anything to the others, it is not M. Ferdinand Fabre, for his work was published under another title several years before either of the others.

As long ago as 1877, six years before 'L'Évangéliste,' 'Madame Fuster' appeared under the title 'La petite mère' (Paris: Dentu; 4 vols., 12mo). These four volumes of the first edition have been compressed into the one now issued, but it is the same work as that of ten years ago; nothing essential has been omitted, and all the changes seem to be omissions made only for the sake of reducing its size to more usual dimensions. It must be confessed, however, that the one volume in which the work now appears is a solid one—more than 500 pages compactly printed. The original work seems to be unknown to the critics who have so far noticed 'Madame Fuster.' Without exception they have all spoken of it as an entirely new book. All this is certainly very strange in the case of so powerful and characteristic a story, by an author who is acknowledged to be among the first of the imaginative writers of the present day.

M. Hector Malot is one of the most prolific of French story-tellers, and one of the most widely read. He has written some interesting books, and one very charming one for boys, 'Roman Kalbris.' The last work which he has added to the long list of his novels is called 'Zyte' (Paris: Charpentier; New York: Westermann), and it is one of the best of his recent stories. Its beginning recalls that of 'Le Capitaine Fracasse.' The wagons of a troupe of itinerant actors are stopped upon the road, at some distance from their place of destination, by darkness and storm and the exhaustion of the horses, and the actors are presented to the reader very much in the manner that those of the famous troupe of that delightful romance are shown to us for the first time. But M. Hector Malot does not imitate Théophile Gautier, it is only a similarity in the opening situation that recalls 'Le Capitaine Fracasse,' as other passages in the book recall other situations in 'Le Roman Comique,' 'L'Homme qui rit,' 'The Old Curiosity Shop,' and a long series of familiar works. 'Zyte' is entirely modern, and, after the first third of the book, Parisian. The heroine, who gives her odd name to the story, passes from the little stage of the family troupe to that of the Odéon, and becomes a great Parisian actress. Both characters and story will interest and please a large circle of readers, as M. Hector Malot's books always do, but 'Zyte' is not a masterpiece of literary art, although executed with the skill of a practised workman.

'André Maynard peintre,' by Mme. Jeanne Mairet (Paris: Ollendorff; New York: Christern), appeared last summer in the feuilleton of the Temps, which of itself is a guarantee of a certain degree of excellence. It is an interesting and well-written story by a skilful writer. The events take place in the world of artists, at first in Rome and afterwards in Paris, and much of the inspiration which produced it seems to have been derived from the actual artistic life of the present time. It is, however, a very feminine book, in its merits as well as in its deficiencies. It has an atmosphere of purity and of honesty of purpose, without prudery, which is very agreeable; but it is almost entirely deficient in that artistic atmosphere which only long association with artists and comradeship with them in ways beyond feminine reach could give; yet the writer, who is the wife of M. Charles Bigot, as the daughter of Healy the artist, may be supposed to have had unusual facilities for observation. The women of the book are real, and not at all the ordinary conventional types; the men are not so well done, though there are occasional touches which show observation and insight where women often fail.

M. Henry Rabusson has already gained for himself a certain rank among the writers of romans mondains, of whom M. Octave Feuillet has long been the leader. His last story, 'Le Stage d'Adhémar' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof), is not equal to 'Le Roman d'un fataliste,' the work in which he reached the highest level of accomplishment he has yet attained, but it is superior to anything else that he has written. M. Rabusson's books are always interesting; his characters are finely drawn, from nature and imagination almost equally, but they live and act consistently, and the reader is never offended by the improbable and the inharmonious, always so much more difficult to forgive than the impossible.

'Tzar, Archiduchesse et Burgraves' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; New York: Christern) is the collective title of three stories by Prince J. Lubomirski, to which he gives the sub-title "Fantaisies historiques," because, as he informs us in his preface, he has allowed himself to take certain liberties with dates and events, while assuring us at the same time that "le procès de Marie Hamilton et les étranges destinées de Frohn et du bâtard de Reuss n'en restent pas moins des faits strictement historiques" – a rather enigmatical assurance, which tells us very little concerning the faithfulness to historic fact of the stories. But, faithful to history or not, the three stories are interesting; and the first one especially, 'Tzar,' has a flavor of the savage court of Peter the Great which seems very real.

Seventeen Lectures on the Study of Medieval and Modern History and Kindred Subjects, delivered at Oxford, under statutory obligation, in the years 1867-1884. By William Stubbs, D.D., Bishop of Chester, etc. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan. 1886. 8vo, pp. 399.

THE seventeen lectures contained in this volume are about half of those delivered "under statutory obligation" by Bishop Stubbs, during his occupation of the Regius Professorship of Modern History at Oxford. He is careful to emphasize, not only on the title-page, but in the preface, and on various occasions in the course of the lectures, that they were delivered "under statutory obligation," and it would not, therefore, be the fault of the ingenuous reader if he should find the work perfunctory and heavy in style. What we are told to believe, we are prone to believe. Some of the lectures have, we must confess, somewhat of a perfunctory character; but even these fairly warrant us in saying that nothing which a scholar of the eminence of Bishop Stubbs puts in print carefully and deliberately is without great and positive merit.

Eight of the lectures are general in character, treating chiefly of methods of historical study; and all of these are marked by solid excellence and sound judgment. Five others—upon the literature of Henry II., upon Canon Law in England, and upon the medieval kingdoms of Cyprus and Armenia — are exceedingly valuable as repertories of valuable and not generally accessible information. The remaining four, upon Henry VII. and Henry VIII., are, to our thinking, the best in the volume. It has always been noted of Bishop Stubbs as an historical writer, that he is exceedingly just and sagacious in the analysis and delineation of character. We have never seen this characteristic more happily displayed than in these four lectures. We suppose that their peculiar freshness and interest come from the fact that their subjects are really fresher in the mind of the author, as his work has, we believe, lain of late largely in the early years of the Tudor period. Dr. Stubbs's opinion of these two kings is on the whole better than that of the average of historians:

"Henry VII. was a virtuous man, sober, temperate, and chaste, withstanding great temptations to vice and an abundant store of loose example. His household was kept frugally and severely; all his advisers, except Empson and Dudley, were men of character unstained, if not energetic for good. For one better or greater king, there are in European history fifty smaller and worse. But still—is there any of that self-denying devotion which gives itself for the people? Is there any true conception of the duty of a shepherd of the host? Is there any impulsive well-doing? I can see none. I see a cold, steady, strongly-purposed man, patient, secret, circumspect; with not many scruples, yet not regardless of men's opinions; very clear-sighted; very willing to wait for reconciliation where there is a chance, and not hasty where vengeance is the only course, but ruthless where his own purpose is directly endangered, and sparing neither friend nor foe where he is not strong enough to rely on himself alone. It may have been a nature too cold to care for popular love, or too self-contained to condescend to court it; there is no evidence that Henry VII. ever dreamed of winning it" (p. 370).

Henry's title to the throne is admirably and lucidly discussed in Lecture xv. He says (p. 345): "It is quite possible to maintain that he was King of England by hereditary right," but adds, in speaking of the Pope's bull of 1486, which declared in favor of his title: "Perhaps the good old man swore a little too hard: the accumulation of reasons may show that Innocent VIII. had some misgiving."

It is worth while also to quote the long passage (p. 289) in which Bishop Stubbs sums up the character of Henry VIII.:

"I have grounds for believing that Henry VIII. was the master, and in no sense the minister, of his people: that, where he carried their good will with him, it was by forcing, not by anticipating or even educating it. I am obliged altogether to reject the notion that he was the interpreter in any sense of the wishes of his people; the utmost that he did in this direction was to manipulate and utilize their prejudices to his own purposes. I allow fully the truth of the theory that one great principle of his policy was to obtain for his measures, for all his measures, the acquiescence of his people, and thus to invest them with a safe, irrefragable authority; but I must add that he knew how to turn opposition into acquiescence, or to take acquiescence for granted. . . .

"And now let me confess that I do not think so badly of Henry VIII. as the received views of either his advocates or his enemies would suggest. The unhappy, most unhappy, history of his wives has brought upon him an amount of moral hatred which is excessive. Nine kings out of any ten whom you may pick out of the list would have saved their character for humanity by simple self-indulgence. No absolutely profligate king could have got into the miserable abyss in which we find Henry VIII. struggling during the latter half of his reign. I do not believe that he was abnormally profligate: in this region of morality he was not better perhaps than Charles V., but he was much better than Francis I., and Philip II., and Henry IV. But he was cruelly, royally vindictive; there was in him an ever-increasing, ever encroaching self-will, ever-grasping, and grasping more and more of power: a self-will guided by a high intellect, and that sort of sincerity which arises from a thorough belief in himself. I am not prepared to deny that deep, cunning, unscrupulous men, like Cromwell, traded on their knowledge of his character; but not one of those who tried to work their own ends through Henry escaped the doom to which false friends and open foes alike found their way."

Perhaps the most interesting point in the lectures of a more general character is the passage in Lecture iv. in which Bishop Stubbs declares himself in a degree opposed to the theory of the unity of history, with which Mr. Freeman has so thoroughly identified himself:

"This idea," he says (p. 84), "has a truth only in the very highest regions of speculation. . . . Why, then, should not cycles of history, two, three, or more cycles of history, be allowed to exist, within which all the really important factors have their origin and development, and, it may be, work out their full destiny; successive great dramas of ages, the interest of which is self-contained, although there is enough of common ground between them and those which precede and follow to give them a simple continuity, and although there is doubtless in the divine mind one great plan of cosmical action in which each drama of the human ages serves as a single act or even a single incident? Let Scripture history, classical and ecclesiastical history, medieval and modern history be read successively and connectedly, so much the better; but why deny that classical history and medieval and modern can be advantageously studied apart? Why confine the thoughts to the points on which they are conterminous, continuous, and agreed, to the exclusion of those in which they differ, when it is on the points in which they differ that the great contributions to the real history of man are to be traced? In any other sense than that in which I have attempted to limit it, the unity of history is either the crotchet of a sciolist or the dream of a universal philosopher."

Mr. Freeman is certainly no sciolist, nor is his forte the philosophy of history; we suppose that, after all, his view does not differ essentially from that here expressed, except in emphasis; but it is in difference of emphasis that much of our difference of opinion exists.

The Venerable Bede, expurgated, expounded, and exposed. By the Prig, author of 'The Life of a Prig.' Henry Holt & Co. 1886.

'THE LIFE OF A PRIG' was not a more palpable hit than its author's latest venture. The satire here does not begin to be so broad as in the former skit, but it is not, on this account, less enjoyable or effective. That it will be enjoyable for all who read it, or might do so, is hardly possible. The Roman Catholics will enjoy it; the dissenters generally will do so; the free-thinkers also. Whether members of the Established Church will do so will depend partly on their sense of humor and partly on their shade of Anglicanism. The latitudinarians and "attitudinarians" will enjoy it much, albeit for very different reasons. The "platitudinarians," i. e., the Low Churchmen, not so much, because it is against them that the satire is for the most part directed. But there are some whose sense of humor is so keen that they can enjoy a little satire at their own expense, and though the "platitudinarians" have, perhaps, less humor than the latitudinarians, they are not all devoid of it, and we may expect a good many of them to laugh heartily over this merry criticism of certain inconsistencies and follies of the English Churchman of to-day.

The authorship of this book and its forerunner has been attributed to Mr. Mallock. They certainly are not unlike his manner as it appears in several of his acknowledged books. But if they are his, he appears to better advantage in them than in such books as 'The New Paul and Virginia' and 'A Nineteenth Century Romance.' There is nothing here of the salacious sort, but there is a lack of delicacy, a certain coarseness, together with the real brightness of the satire, that makes Mr. Mallock's authorship seem extremely probable.

The writer may not be a Roman Catholic. It is quite possible to imagine him a dissenter, or even an agnostic; but it is evident that, in the controversy between Anglicanism and Romanism regarding their degrees of venerableness and priority, his sympathies are with the Roman Catholics. His satire has a double operation. It kills two birds with its one stone: first, the habit of distorting history in the interests of special doctrines or emergencies; and second, the eagerness of certain Anglicans to show that their church is not of Roman Catholic parentage, but is descended directly from the ancient British Church, centuries older than the mission of Austin as a representative of the Roman See. The author's method is to take passage after passage from Bede, using Dr. Giles's translation, and then add his comment, which is generally much fuller than the text. The devices that are resorted to by Anglicans to show that their church had never any taint of Roman practices and superstitions are not satirized more severely than they deserve to be. The miracle-working of the early British Christians, their relics, and masses, and so on, are all subjected to an amusing commentary—are all, as they appear in Bede, denied as spurious, or explained away in some ridiculously insufficient manner. For example, when the Bishop Germanus applies a casket of relics to the eyes of a blind girl, who at once receives her sight, we are told that "in all probability he projected it, propelled it, or, as boys would vulgarly say, 'shied it' at the girl's eyes, which were immediately delivered from darkness and filled with the light of truth." "Obviously this means that when the girl perceived that a Bishop threw a casket of relics at her head, she saw clearly enough that he set no value on them." The patronage of Roman Catholic services by Anglicans travelling on the Continent comes in for a portion of the satire. Bede's account of the arrival and reception of St. Austin calls for a more violent ingenuity than anything preceding it to establish the independence of the English Church on the Roman Catholic. Then it was that the ancient British Church went to sleep for a thousand years and only awakened in time to solemnize the nuptials of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn. In conclusion, the Prig thinks it is high time that the Roman Catholic Church took her turn and went metaphorically to bed. "She has been uncommonly wide awake during the last eighteen hundred years! I, for one, think that a thousand years of sound sleep would be very nice for her. Cannot the science of the nineteenth century devise a narcotic for this wakeful and restless patient?"

The Republic of New Haven. A History of Municipal Evolution. By Charles H. Levermore, Ph.D. Baltimore: N. Murray. 1886.

THIS was the first of the extra volumes in the series of Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science. The purpose of the book is to trace the social and political history of New Haven from the foundation of the colony to the present time.

The original settlement was singularly free from the outside influences which helped determine the character of many of the colonial communities, and its peculiar institutions and customs were well defined before it was brought into close contact either with the other colonies or with England. The church and other strong internal influences also developed the town's individuality, which was allowed to become permanent by the slow and usually uniform growth of population which lasted for more than two centuries.

The community has an unusual variety of local governments. The original organization of the New England town is still retained, and New Haven is probably the only example in history of a democracy which allowed 16,000 electors to meet in a popular assembly to lay taxes and exercise other important legislative and administrative functions. In the midst of the town a city has grown up, and of late years has become a manufacturing and railroad centre with a population of 70,000. Just beyond the boundaries of the city, but within the limits of the town, lies another municipality, with full corporate powers, called the Borough of Fair Haven East. Besides these organizations, the town contains three separate school districts, one of which includes the whole city and has a distinct and peculiar government of its own. Mr. Levermore traces the rise and development of these various institutions, shows how they have acted upon each other, and points out the controlling forces which have made them what they are. He has examined thoroughly the large amount of historical material at his disposal. The matter incorporated in this book is well arranged, and the statements of fact are usually full and accurate.

The last two chapters of this volume have been republished in the regular series of Johns Hopkins Studies. They are more carefully written than the earlier portions of the book, and their style is better. These chapters give the history of the government of New Haven from the granting of the first city charter in 1784, with a good description of the government as it is now. It is to be regretted that an author so well qualified for the work has not paid more attention to the causes which led to the successive changes in the city charter, and in the laws that control the other institutions which he discusses. One of the greatest needs of the student of municipal affairs is information concerning the merits and demerits of the various systems under which our cities have been governed in the past, and concerning the circumstances under which these systems were tested. Of course such information is hard to obtain, as it must usually be collected from those who have held office under these governments and can speak from personal observation of how the political machinery in question worked. The affairs of any large municipality are complicated and difficult to understand, and the peculiar circumstances under which an experiment in local government is tried are frequently such as to cause a bad form of government to work fairly well, or a good form to fail to produce the beneficial results which were reasonably expected. These are facts which the man in public life appreciates, but which men like Mr. Levermore, who learn more about municipal affairs in their studies than in the city hall, sometimes fail to take into account. These remarks apply particularly to the closing chapter of the book, in which the author points out the defects in the government of New Haven, and suggests remedies. Many of his criticisms are, however, very just, and it is to be hoped that some of the reforms which he proposes may be tried.

While this book has a special value for the people of New Haven, the general student of municipal government will find in it much that is interesting and instructive.

A Half-Century in Salem. By M. C. D. Silsbee. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

WHEN one has read this little book, he tries in vain to fix the charm of it. There are but a hundred small pages, which have grown out of a paper read by the author to her friends some years ago; and the substance of them is a series of scenes from the old life of Salem in its East-India age, to which her own memory goes back. There are many of these, and many figures in them, drawn from home-life or from the shops, the streets, the wharves, the pulpit, and the ball-room; and the background of the whole is the tradition of Salem, which is in itself a kind of spell. These Democrats and Federalists, who were opposed to each other even in the order of their courses at dinner (for the Federalist took his pudding first and then his meat), were very great partisans, according to our ideas, when, in consequence of the feud, the founder of the Gray family thought it best to remove his Democratic self and his wealth to Boston; but, on the other side, the Thanksgiving dinner of the Pickerings seems to have been a gathering of friendly people, and one reads of one minister, Dr. William Bentley, the patriot of the war of 1812, who had so much of the milk of human kindness in him that, in the absence of a priest, he confessed a poor French woman, as he knew her language, and gave her absolution. But one does not need to describe the well-known community of men and women of the old time, with their stately yet cordial ways, their eccentricities, their vigor and character, of whom the best made that union of severity with nobleness which always wins great reverence for a man's memory. In this fragmentary and informal sketch of the time, the young people relieve the dignity of provincial splendor with their dances, sleigh-rides, and the charms of beauty with which the famous Harvard Class of '29 is said to have been well acquainted. There is a description, too, of Capt. George Crowninshield's Cleopatra's Barge, which was the forerunner of our luxurious yachts, and spread American glory in the Mediterranean with more effect than any of the later fleet of pleasure-boats; but, rather than detail the points of the volume, it is better to leave them to the reader's discovery.

The manner and the spirit of these recollections are very kindly, with the touch of the gentleness and human patience, as well as of the transforming regret, of old age. One more memorial has been added to days which will long retain a place in New England history; and if any one, not born to the tradition of the privateers and the merchantmen of this coast, has a taste for the events and aspects of quiet, picturesque, provincial life, he cannot find a book more pleasantly and richly suggestive, or one that will lead his fancy more agreeably to the old days.

Legends and Popular Tales of the Basque People. By Mariana Monteiro. With Illustrations in Photogravure by Harold Copping. A. C. Armstrong & Son. 1887. 8vo, pp, vi, 274.

THE title of this work is very misleading, for one would suppose from it that he had before him a collection of stories such as are told by the Basque people. The truth is, that the authoress has dressed up in a very un-English garb a few local traditions, and translated a few ballads of doubtful popularity. Two examples will show the utter worthlessness of the book for the student of popular traditions. One of the most common themes in popular tales is that of a person who, overhearing the secret of a witch, learns the means of curing a princess who is at the point of death. A second person, who tries to follow the example of the first, is discovered by the witch and torn to pieces. Versions of this theme may be found in Grimm's "The Two Travellers" and Crane's 'Italian Popular Tales,' p. 325, and a genuine Basque version in Rev. Wentworth Webster's 'Basque Legends,' p. 66. Now, Mme. Monteiro has taken this theme, located it on a certain mountain in the Basque country, and turned it from a fairy tale into a tradition of the neighborhood. What the Basque story really is may be seen from Webster's collection or from Cerquand's 'Légendes et Récits populaires du Pays Basque,' Pt. iv, p. 48. The other case is that of the legend of Roland at Roncevaux. Mme. Monteiro might easily have given some interesting popular legends of Roland, who is still the hero of a romance in the Basque land (see Cerquand, iv, p. 14), but she has preferred to give a modern hunting adventure, to which the legend bears the smallest possible relation.

Those who wish to learn something about Basque popular literature will still be obliged to look for it in the works above mentioned, and in J. Vinson's 'Le Folk-Lore du Pays Basque.' The reader in search of entertainment can spend a pleasant hour over a book that will transport him to a fresh locality, and which is full of charming poetic feeling, although not always expressed in very smooth English. The four illustrations by Mr. Copping do not call for any special mention by way of praise.

A Practical Rhetoric for Instruction in English Composition and Revision, in Colleges and Intermediate Schools. By J. Scott Clark, A.M., Professor of Rhetoric in the College of Liberal Arts, Syracuse University. Henry Holt & Co. 1886.

THERE is no study commonly taught in schools for which it is more difficult to provide a serviceable text-book than the much-abused one of rhetoric. The older manuals are full of disquisitions, no doubt admirable in comprehensive and searching criticism of the principles of composition, but unprofitable for the grade of pupils whom it is meant to reach. The failure is the common one which attends on all attempts to teach a practical art by words instead of by use of the tools; for the end of rhetoric is to instruct pupils how to do something—namely, to speak and write in proper form—and the older text-books sought to effect this mainly by elaborate and usually wordy expositions of past methods, instead of by direct and fruitful practice. Of late years rhetorics have been improved by the insertion in them of pages of examples to be corrected, and this is the principal gain that has been made. Prof. Clark has adopted this plan on a very extensive scale, and he has also had the sense to cut down the disquisition portion, which is largely a matter of tradition, to reasonable limits, and has certainly relieved it of its worst redundancies. His new text-book is of about the same bulk as the traditional one, but it includes the whole subject, from punctuation and capitalizing to metres, and treats it under the old heads—Clearness, Purity, Persuasion, etc. The text proper, however, consists of brief, clear, and well-worded rules, with an illustrative example under each; and each chapter is supplemented by pages of excellently chosen examples to be corrected, by the application of the preceding set of rules. The method is very rigorously adhered to. The result is, what the author puts upon the title-page as the characteristic description of his text-book, 'A Practical Rhetoric,' and the adjective is well deserved; for while it contains the rules, its object is to instruct by working them out, just as in arithmetic. For the basis of correct writing there can be no better preparation; and as to style, ornament, and the graces of expression, all that may well be left to the individual's growth in taste, out of which it must come spontaneously, unless it is to be artificial, pretentious, and worthless. We cordially recommend the volume to the attention of teachers.

Nordafrika im Lichte der Kulturgeschichte. In gemeinverständlicher Darstellung von Gustav Diercks. Munich. 1886.

SINCE the conquest of Algeria by the French, the author remarks in his preface, the interest of civilized nations in the northern coast-lands of Africa has constantly been growing, keeping pace with that enlisted in colonizing purposes by the gradual unlocking of the unknown interior of the continent, and in commercial enterprises by the opening of water communication between the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean through the Suez Canal. These latter achievements have rendered the possession of the North-African territories more valuable than ever, and a knowledge of their present condition and historical development very desirable. Special works on Egypt, ancient or modern, on Carthage, Algeria, etc., of course, abound; but a connected picture of the history of all these countries, of their advances and relapses in the course of ages, has been wanting in general literature, and to supply it is the aim of this book. It is not intended to be exhaustive, learned, or in any way "doctrinaire." It means to group the most marked events, to point out salient characteristics, to illustrate the successive unfoldings, and especially to define clearly the latest developments.

This plan has been strictly adhered to, and very creditably carried out. In a popular and pleasantly animated manner, the writer sketches the North-African races in general; the Egypt of the Pharaohs, its character and wondrous achievements; the Carthaginians and their struggles with Rome; the culture of Cyrene and Alexandria, and the growth of Christianity, under Roman sway and Jewish influences, in the Nile lands; Vandals and Byzantines in their contests for Christianized Carthage; the Arab conquest, and the sway of Islam over the whole coast, from Pelusium to Morocco; Corsairs and Turks in the Barbary States, and the European expeditions against them, down to the conquests of Algeria and Tunis by France; Egypt under Mehemet Ali and his successors, down to Tewfik; and the present rivalries of the European Powers for predominance on the African coast. The picture is exceedingly varied, but it does not lack unity, and symmetry is preserved throughout. Characters and traits apt to strike the imagination are preferably selected, but sensationalism is avoided, and so is every display of erudition. A rigid abstention in this regard, coupled with general correctness in what is popularly presented, almost disarms criticism. The "gemeinverständliche Darstellung," however, has here and there caused some vague talk about conditions of culture, and occasionally too light a touch upon grave matters—as, for instance, when the author, in the beginning of the chapter on "Christianity and Vandals," hints, in scanty words, at the theories deriving the origin of the Christian religion from the speculations of the Stoics, and "especially of Seneca, who created an abstract ideal of a perfect godlike man, whose embodiment Jesus so completely appeared to be that modern criticism might dare, on this ground, to deny his personality." This may also serve to illustrate the wide range of the book.

A ROMANCE OF MOUNT DESERT.

The Jesuit's Ring.

By A. A. Hayes. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

The romantic circumstances of the loss and recovery of a precious legendary ring worn by one of the Jesuit Missionaries, who attempted in the seventeenth century to establish a settlement on Mount Desert Island, most happily connects this story of society and love-making at contemporary Bar Harbor with the early legends of Maine. It is a novel of incident, in which the action is enlivened with delightful sketches of summer life at Mount Desert.

Creed and Character.

By Canon H. S. Holland, M.A., Senior Student of Christ Church, Oxford, 1 vol., 12mo, $1.50.

Canon Holland's volume of sermons, Logic and Life, published four years ago, had many readers who bore unanimous testimony to the rare intellectual power, spiritual beauty, and reverent spirit of the book.

In this new volume the sermons all suggest a single paramount idea and tend towards a single conclusion: which is to show that Christianity is not a set of theological ideas, but the manifestation of the personality of Christ exhibited in the Creed of the Christian Church and the Christian character.

With Special Reference to the Theories of Renan, Strauss, and the Tübingen School. By George P. Fisher, D.D. New and cheaper edition, uniform with 'The Reformation,' etc. Crown 8vo, $2.50.

Of this work the Congregationalist says: "We know of nothing so good as this volume for the reading of any intelligent mind, which is in itself disturbed by the rationalism which it combats and refutes, or which desires to learn how to handle such discussions in the arena of daily discussions."

Cloth, $3.

When Benjamin Franklin died, in 1790, he left to his grandson, Wm. Temple Franklin, the largest collection of his papers. This collection, which had been supposed to be irrevocably lost, was found a few years since on the top shelf of an old tailor's shop in St. James, became the property of Mr. Henry Stevens, and finally of the United States. From this collection and from other original documents, this life of 'Franklin in France' has been written.

"I am greatly obliged to you for your most important contribution to our knowledge of Franklin. Your volume shows that you agree with me that whatever attracts readers to Franklin's writings and to the study of his public career is a benefaction to humanity. . . . We can never have too much from the pen of a man who never wrote a dull line or a foolish one. . . . I have read it ('Franklin in France') with the greatest satisfaction."—John Bigelow, editor of 'The Works of Franklin,' to Mr. Hale.

"Early this morning I received your delicious book on Franklin, and have spent the day in reading it. You have brought together a great mass of things new and instructive and exceedingly pleasant to read. It takes a person who is familiar with the subject of your studies and the times to know how much of what you have brought forward was unpublished."—George Bancroft, the Historian, in a letter to Mr. Hale.

"No such exhaustive record of this important period of our history exists in the language."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"Dr. Hale and his son have brought together, in addition to well-known letters and documents, many important papers now first published, and have presented a picture of great force and vividness of the difficulties which Franklin had to encounter in Paris, and which he met with so much tact and so serene a temper. The story must be read as a whole, and any attempt to select characteristic extracts from these new letters would only give a very inadequate impression of their intrinsic interest and of the services which they help to illustrate."—Boston Post.

"It is a curious circumstance that two distinguished students of American history have been simultaneously engaged in the exploration of the Franklin papers, purchased by the United States Government in 1882, and that the results of their discoveries, the first important fruits of that national acquisition, are given to the public almost at the same moment. Mr. Bigelow and Mr. Hale have worked on different lines and with different purposes, and are not likely to interfere with each other. They agree in bearing testimony to the great value of the collection of letters and other documents bequeathed by Franklin to his grandson, and now, after many strange vicissitudes, safely deposited in the library of the State Department at Washington. It includes nearly 3,000 papers; of the whole bulk more than one-half has never been printed, and the unpublished portions apparently comprise most of the correspondence of Franklin's later years. Probably the new materials will not oblige us to reverse any notable verdict of history, but they will throw a strong light upon some obscure affairs, and illustrate with fresh force the extraordinarily various services of Franklin to his native country."—New York Tribune.

"The Messrs. Edward Everett Hale, senior and junior, recognizing the especial importance of Benjamin Franklin's correspondence during his ministry abroad, and with a far greater stock of material from which to draw than that examined by either Mr. Parton or Mr. John Bigelow in the preparation of their well-known works on Franklin, send forth a volume entitled 'Franklin in France,' and composed almost entirely of original documents, most of which are now published for the first time. The great value of such a work, especially to historical students and writers, is apparent at a glance. Heretofore they were obliged to travel to Washington if they would examine those of Franklin's papers that are in the library of the State Department; to Philadelphia, where so much of the Franklinana is in the possession of the American Philosophical Society; to Boston and Cambridge and various other cities, in which portions of the Franklin correspondence are preserved; whereas now all the documents of national importance written by and to Franklin between the years of 1767 and 1781, which are not to be found in other accessible books, may be held in the reader's hand in his own library. The editors of the present volume have done their work with the most painstaking care. 'Our business has been,' they say, 'to tell our story as briefly and as clearly as one could, and to print such illustrations as the new material offered, or as were not of ready access in well-furnished libraries.' They have made extracts from important writings of Franklin now in public institutions, and what must have been far more difficult, have collected letters written by less famous personages to him during his residence in France, from all quarters of the globe. These latter documents show, even more clearly than the others, how diplomatically Franklin secured French friends singly and collectively for the American cause. In spite of the great amount of correspondence given, the Messrs. Hale have preserved the thread of their narrative intact from beginning to end. Their style is direct and simple, their arrangement of the work admirable, and the book itself is, in every particular, calculated to be of great assistance to the student of American history."—Washington Capital.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1887.

The Week.

THE President supplemented his active exercise of the veto power during the last two years by an application of the "pocket veto" to the River and Harbor Bill in the closing days of the session. This was a great public service. The bill was not only objectionable for the usual faults of log-rolling extravagance, but it was especially offensive because it committed the Government to the outrageous Hennepin Canal scheme. There is enough money left over from last year's bill for most of the work which ought to be done, and the remainder can better wait than to have jobs like the Hennepin Canal saddled upon the Treasury. The failure of the two houses to agree upon any fortification bill is unfortunate, but it is better than would have been their harmony upon some of the wild schemes which have been canvassed. Through such harmony at the very end, after a prolonged squabble, over $11,000,000 was appropriated for a new naval establishment in a happy-go-lucky fashion which cannot be too severely condemned.

The current discussion as to the possibility of the President's making the River and Harbor Bill a law by affixing his signature days after the expiration of the Congress which passed it, is one which ought to bear fruit. Mr. Willis, the Chairman of the House Committee which prepared the bill, has made a study of the subject, and insists that, should the bill receive the President's signature within ten days from its presentation to him, no doubt could be cast upon its validity as a law by the courts. In support of this, he has called Mr. Cleveland's attention to decisions of the highest courts of Georgia, Louisiana, and some other States, sustaining the validity of laws signed by the Chief Executives of those States after adjournment of the Legislature, and he maintains that in the Constitution of all such States there is a method prescribed by which bills shall become laws substantially like that in the Federal Constitution. He claims that the Supreme Court of the United States has already virtually decided this question, by declaring with one voice a certain law upon the statute-books of the State of Illinois to be valid, though it was signed by the Governor after the Legislature had adjourned, the constitutional method of making laws in Illinois being practically the same as that indicated in article 1, section 7, of the Federal Constitution. A case is also cited where President Lincoln signed a bill after the adjournment of Congress which was held to be a valid law, though this precedent is rendered of little account by the fact that Congress subsequently passed an act specifically legalizing his course in the matter.

It is safe to say that all these pleas will avail nothing with Mr. Cleveland, supposing him to wish the River and Harbor Bill to become a law, which is not the case. With the single exception of the Lincoln case referred to above, it appears to have been always held that the President's prerogative of participation in the legislation of Congress lapsed with the adjournment of that body, and this is certainly the most natural interpretation to place upon the language used in the Constitution: "If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law." It would be anomalous, if not unjustifiable, for a President at this late day to assume the possession of a power which was not supposed to inhere in his predecessors during a period covering almost a century. But there is a great deal to be said in favor of an amendment to the Constitution which will explicitly confer upon the President the power of signing bills after the adjournment of Congress, not merely for ten days, but for a month. The provision of the New York State Constitution upon this subject, as amended in 1874, adopts the language of the Federal Constitution just quoted almost verbatim, and then adds: "No bill shall become a law after the final adjournment of the Legislature, unless approved by the Governor within thirty days after such adjournment." A similar power was vested in the Governor of Pennsylvania by the new Constitution adopted in 1873. In each case the system has worked greatly to the public advantage in these States, and it is obvious that the extension of a similar power to the President would work equally well in national affairs.

With this should be joined the provision incorporated in the New York State Constitution, that "if any bill presented to the Governor [President] contain several items of appropriation of money, he may object to one or more of such items, while approving of the other portion of the bill." If these two provisions were now a part of the Constitution, Mr. Cleveland might at his leisure go through the River and Harbor Bill, veto the Hennepin Canal job and other objectionable items, and, by approving the remainder, secure all the good of the measure without any of its harm. An amendment covering these two points, of thirty days after a session for the consideration of bills and of power to veto separate items in appropriation bills, ought to be started on its passage by the Fiftieth Congress. Public sentiment would compel its ratification by the Legislatures of the various States.

The fact is not yet appreciated that the President's attitude towards the pension craze did more than simply block the passage of the Pauper Pension Bill. It was Mr. Cleveland's position which also killed the arrears job. It will be remembered that Mr. Ingalls secured the passage, in the Senate, of a motion discharging the Pension Committee from all further consideration of the bill repealing the limitation of time contained in the original Arrears Act of 1879, and everything indicated that the demagogues, who are always bidding for "the soldier vote," would be able to rush the scheme through both branches. But the veto of the Pauper Pension Bill arrested the progress of the arrears job, and it was never more heard of. This was a most indefensible measure. Senator Sherman three years ago properly characterized it when he said: "I deny in toto that there is any obligation in law or in morals or in good faith to our soldiers to remove the restrictions of existing law. It is not right for the soldier to apply for arrears." Mr. Sherman further showed that the repeal would probably mulct the Treasury in the enormous sum of $246,000,000. And yet there is no doubt that, if Mr. Blaine had been elected President, this bill would have gone through Congress and have been signed, the platform of the Republican National Convention in 1884 having declared that "the Republican party pledges itself to the repeal of the limitation contained in the Arrears Act of 1879." The salvation of the country from this $246,000,000 arrears job, as well as from the $70,000,000 or $75,000,000 annual addition to the pension roll involved in the Pauper Pension Bill, is thus due solely to the defeat of the Republican candidate for the Presidency in 1884.

The repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act during the last days of the recent Congress solved one question that might have caused perplexity, namely, the President's right to fill, after the adjournment of the Senate and without calling an extra session, an office created by the Congress just adjourned. One section of that act, after giving the President authority to fill vacancies happening during a recess of the Senate, went on to say: "And if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate is made to an office so vacant or temporarily filled during such next session of the Senate, the office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments," etc. Constitutional lawyers like Senator Edmunds have held very strenuously that under this provision the President could not fill a new office temporarily without the Senate's consent, and fears have been expressed that in this way the new United States Judgeship for this district, just created by Congress, would have to await a nomination until the Senate meets again. The removal of this nice legal point from the realm of discussion is only one of the benefits resulting from the repeal of the out-of-date Tenure-of-Office Act.

If Mr. George Frisbie Hoar possessed any sense of humor, he could hardly have had the assurance requisite for his performance in executive session of the Senate on Friday. During the campaign of 1884 nobody was more sure than the Massachusetts Bourbon that the election of Mr. Cleveland meant the relegation of the colored race to a condition of political if not indeed of physical servitude. On Friday Mr. Hoar rose to urge the confirmation, for the lucrative office of Recorder of Deeds in the District of Columbia, of a negro nominated for that position by Mr. Cleveland, vouching for his good character, and declaring that he "had received letters from scores of the best people of Massachusetts commending the appointment." The Republican majority of the Senate yielded to the insistence of Mr. Hoar and Mr. Dawes upon Mr. Trotter's confirmation; but their retreat from the original rejection of a negro for the office simply because he was a Democratic negro, comes too late to affect the conclusion of all intelligent negroes in the matter. The Matthews rejection broke down the color line, and the Trotter confirmation cannot restore it.

The long struggle over the question of retaliatory measures towards Canada because of her course in the fishery matter ended in the acceptance by the House of the Senate bill, which authorizes the President to prohibit Canadian vessels from entering American ports, and to prohibit Canadian fish, fresh or salt, and, if he wishes, all other Canadian products, from coming into this country, but does not authorize the exclusion of Canadian locomotives and cars from the United States, which last would practically amount to declaring absolute non-intercourse between the two countries. It seems doubtful whether occasion will arise for the President to exercise the power vested in him. Congress evidently does not consider that such an exigency exists, or it would itself have employed its prerogative of suspending commercial relations; and it will require a very strong case to compel Mr. Cleveland to use the extraordinary authority thus surrendered to him by Congress.

The Committee of the House which was sent out some months ago to investigate the causes and extent of the railroad strike in the Southwest, has presented its report, which contains nothing very new. It estimates the loss of the strike to the strikers at about $900,000; the loss to the men who did not strike but were thrown out of employment by the strike, at $500,000; the loss to the Missouri Pacific Railroad at $2,800,000. The total ascertainable cost of the strike was thus $4,200,000. The loss to the public through the stoppage or derangement of business is of course not ascertainable, but the Committee estimate it at "millions of dollars." It must be remembered, too, that the leader and author of all this mischief, Martin Irons, was and is now literally a drunken vagabond. The Committee, while acknowledging fully the lawfulness of strikes and of combinations to strike, condemn in the most unqualified terms the use of violence or of any species of coercion to compel men to strike, or to prevent their taking the place of strikers if so minded.

This is all, however, now a tolerably old story. The report is mainly interesting as furnishing a good illustration of what the effect of the continued or increased discontent of manual laborers on property and industry would be. Many people suppose, and many lecturers and writers talk, as if it were all going to end in some great revolution, or catastrophe, or cataclysm, in which society would somehow be turned upside down, and the workingmen all ride in carriages, and have boxes at the opera, while the capitalists would go afoot and sit in the upper gallery. There is not the least likelihood of anything of the kind. What we have to expect, if the intelligence of workingmen does not increase, is simply a frequent repetition in various branches of trade or industry of strikes like that on the Southwestern railroads. The effect of this would be simply a considerable diminution in the rate of material progress, increased reluctance on the part of capital to invest in permanent enterprises, and a gradual decline in profits and wages. The United States, in other words, would become a much less prosperous country than they have been during the past fifty years. Their industrial condition would approximate to that of France or Germany or Italy under huge standing armies. The protracted presence of a large discontented, unintelligent, and unreasonable laboring population would produce almost precisely the same effects in trade and industry as large armaments and constant fear of foreign wars produce in those of European countries. Confidence in the future, which is the life of trade, would be greatly lessened, and the hopefulness which breeds the national energy would cease to be a national characteristic. Social cataclysms, in fact, are just as rare as physical ones.

The effort to increase wages by sheer force—and that wages are arbitrarily fixed and can be increased by sheer force, is the fallacy which underlies all the mistakes made by the labor organizations—never led to a more instructive failure than the failure of the workmen in the shoe factories at Haverhill, Mass. Haverhill was the home of a large and prosperous portion of the shoemakers of New England. But within the last two years manufacturers who made a million dollars' worth of shoes a year have moved their factories to other towns, and there is now work for 600 fewer shoemakers in Haverhill than there was two years ago; there is, too, imminent danger of another exodus of "capitalists." The machinery for making shoes is not difficult to transplant, and the business can be carried on at one town as well as at another if the manufacturers are permitted to enjoy "natural advantages." The "natural advantage" in this case is not free land, but free labor. The labor of Haverhill was enslaved by an organization which also took away the freedom of the manufacturers to employ labor, to discharge it, or to fix the price for it as their business demanded. That "capitalists" have gone from a community where they were thus hampered, is not the most significant result of this effort to raise wages by sheer force, for the working people who were denied employment have also gone to smaller towns, and have done the same kind of work for less pay. Every pair of shoes made by them has driven a pair made by the union workmen at Haverhill out of the market. Middle men in the trade are now taking a greater share of the profits than the large manufacturers took; for the small trader, who is neither Labor nor Capital, but a mere handler of the products of both, who has well-nigh been made useless by good commercial organization, is getting what ought to go into the savings banks from the working people, and into dividends for the capitalists. Haverhill is simply going back from the period of savings banks, and good wages, and dividends, and commercial organization to the period of the cobbler in his hut.

A short time since, the Department of State, in reply to a query from our Consul-General at Shanghai, concerning the construction of the Chinese Immigration Acts of 1882 and 1884, decided that Chinese nurses or body-servants were not such "laborers" as to come within the prohibitions of our law. The Treasury Department, having been requested by the Secretary of State to give effect to this decision, by instructing collectors of customs to permit the landing of such persons, referred the matter to the Attorney-General for his opinion. That officer has sustained the decision of the Department of State, and our port officers will be requested, in a circular letter soon to be issued by the Treasury, to let all Chinamen of this class come upon our soil. It seems, however, that body-servants are permitted, under this ruling, only to visit our shores, not to become permanent residents; and in no event are they to cease to be body-servants. They are allowed to come because they are "menials"; they must not dare to aspire to the grade of "laborers." A few years ago it was decided, as may be remembered, that Chinese laborers might be permitted to go through our territory to Canada, provided they secured "through" tickets, but that in no case should they be allowed to "stop over." They were required to be shipped, as one may say, in "sealed cars." Now we have another relaxation. Those of them who do not compete with any American laborers, except that contemptible class which "wears the garb of the serf," may attend their employers who come to the United States, but they must go back to China as soon as they doff this garb. What will happen if Chinese nurses and body-servants should dare to change their occupations, or refuse to depart with their masters who embark again for China, we should not like to say.

The Field Code unexpectedly passed the Assembly on Thursday, after it had been apparently hopelessly lost the day before. In the course of a single hour, its promoter, very young Mr. Ives, rose from the position of a discredited blockhead to that of an able and acute manager. All this was due to his physical energy and activity in hunting up six more votes for the bill in the lobbies and purlieus of the Capitol. These six voters knew and cared no more about the comparative value of the code and of the common law than of the comparative merits of the German and French guns. What they sought was to please the indefatigable Ives, and to do this they were doubtless willing either to make a radical change in the laws of a great commercial community, or go out and take a drink with him. The whole affair is really a dreadful farce. Whether the bill will pass the Senate under these circumstances we do not know.

The successful carrying out of the Republican plan to end the Senatorial contest in New Jersey would be a subject of congratulation for many reasons, even if the Democrat who was elected by Republican support gave less promise of a satisfactory course at Washington than does Mr. Blodgett. A man of higher character than ex-Gov. Abbett has proved himself to be would have deserved defeat, after lending himself to the consummation of so foul a plot as the theft of the Camden County seat in the Assembly. This offence is concededly so gross an outrage that the condemnation of it in all political circles is likely to prevent another attempt of the kind for many years in New Jersey. Mr. Blodgett is still to be tested as a national lawmaker. But men of sound judgment, who have had business relations with him, say that, while lacking educational advantages and by no means an ideal Senator, he is independent and incorruptible, a man who knows his own mind and will not yield his opinions to the dictation of any "boss." He is in one sense a "railroad man," that is, he has for several years been in the employ of a railroad at a moderate salary. But it is said that he will not be a "railroad Senator," as so many of his predecessors have been. The Republican party in New Jersey will undoubtedly be strengthened by the defeat of Senator Sewell for a re-election, and it will have a better chance to elect a Senator in 1889, when Mr. McPherson's time expires, than if it had put a man of its own politics into the office now, by securing the necessary votes through questionable means.

We must defer till next week any careful estimate of the late Henry Ward Beecher's quality both as a preacher and writer and as a man. In bidding him farewell, the American people take leave, one may safely say, of the last of a grand generation—the most trumpet-tongued of all the orators who wrought the great revolution in politics, and we may add in morals, of which the war was but the outward and visible sign. His faults, like his virtues, were very conspicuous, and everybody heard enough of them in his lifetime. But, take him for all in all the American people will hardly ever look on his like again—will hardly ever see in pulpit or on platform any one who could so easily put an audience into the heroic mood, and who on the whole used his great power for such noble ends. The conditions under which such orators as he were bred are wholly changed, and any one who heard Beecher at his best may feel sure that he has had an experience of which the next generation will know nothing.

The death of such a man afflicts the public not only in what it takes away, but in what it brings, in the rush of little people anxious to attract notice, if but for a moment, by some association of themselves with the great man. There is reason to anticipate on the present occasion a horde of these mortuary speculators unusual in numbers and eagerness, for Mr. Beecher's eminence and singular prominence afford almost unique opportunity and temptation, while the people, as a class, who were nearly associated with him in life are not distinguished for the qualities of reserve and restraint. Accordingly there are already portentous signs of Personal Reminiscences, Recollections, Impressions, Sayings and Doings, etc., designed chiefly not to throw new light on Mr. Beecher, but to explain that the narrator was honored with his friendship. We hope the newspapers will as far as possible disappoint these lovers of notoriety.

There is an undeniable nervousness on the part of many Mexican politicians over the question of the succession to President Diaz. The experiment of 1880, in choosing a mediocre lieutenant to keep the executive chair warm for his chief for four years, was not satisfactory to either Gen. Diaz or the country. The difficulties in the way of a discreet choice, which will have to be made two years hence unless some way can be devised of getting round the constitutional prohibition of re-election, are already seen to be enormous. They were reflected in last fall's excited talk about making Diaz Dictator. A more sober manifestation of the vague apprehension with which the close of the President's term is anticipated appears in the proposed amendment to the Constitution recently urged by the Legislature of the State of Puebla upon the attention of the Permanent Deputation of the Federal Congress. In Mexico, under section 65 of the Constitution, the right to introduce bills in Congress is accorded to the legislatures of the States, and in pursuance of that privilege the Puebla Legislature now asks that article 78 of the Constitution, fixing the Presidential term, be so amended that the term of office of any incumbent can be prolonged to six years if Congress so votes. This proposition passed the Legislature of Puebla nearly a year ago, but, owing to private assurances from Gen. Diaz that he did not favor the movement, and to the open opposition of the Government organ at that time, the matter was dropped and was supposed to be killed. Its revival now and presentation in Congress, with the silence thus far of the Diario Oficial, are giving rise to much speculation. President Diaz would doubtless find no difficulty in getting Congress to vote him two years more of power, or anything else he might ask; but what would he do with article 14 of the Constitution, which forbids the enactment of a retroactive law?

The signs of war in the East between Austria and Russia appear now to be as strong as the signs of war between France and Germany were three weeks ago. The military revolt at Silistria and Rustchuk was undoubtedly set on foot by Russian agents, and if it be true that similar outbreaks are occurring elsewhere, the remarks of the Journal de St.-Pétersbourg, that "the riot" was not unexpected, and that it is to be hoped the people will be spared the horrors of civil war, point clearly enough to the conclusion that there is shortly to be "anarchy" enough in Bulgaria to make it seem to the Czar his imperative duty to occupy the country he has rescued from the Turks. That the Rumanians, Servians, and Bulgarians will make common cause with the Austrians in preventing his doing anything of the sort, there appears to be little doubt. If he makes the attempt, it will probably be the result of an assurance that Germany will not interfere with him or allow France to do so. Bismarck's "What do we care about Bulgaria?" was probably a most pregnant observation; anyhow, the materials for a tremendous blaze are all ready for the match. The Hungarian Parliament has voted all the credits asked for by the War Minister.

The last number of the Nouvelle Revue contains an interesting speculation by M. Henri des Houx, under the signature of "Paul Vasili," in answer to the question, Who will be the next Pope?—a question of daily increasing importance in view of the condition of the present Pope's health. He says there are three elements to be considered in the College of Cardinals: (1) the purely Roman element which surrounds the Papal throne, does the work of the Congregations, and depends entirely on the Pope; (2) the Italian element formed by the archbishops and bishops of Italy, who are subject to the exequatur of the Italian Government, and as much dependent on the King as on the Pope; (3) the foreign element, composed of the foreign cardinals—that is, of archbishops and bishops either in Catholic or non-Catholic States. The Romans make up a little more than half of the Sacred College—that is, about forty out of the seventy cardinals All are not Italians. There are ten of them resident in Rome, of whom four are Germans, one Russian, one Austrian, one English, one Pole, two French; the German element thus predominating. The Italian cardinals are nine in number. All of them, except the Archbishop of Palermo, who is wholly independent of the Italian Government, naturally feel kindly towards the Power which supports them. Seven of these are known to be in favor of a reconciliation between the Vatican and the Quirinal, and it is from these, of course, that the Italian Government will select the candidate which it will support.

The non-resident cardinals number twenty-five, of whom five are Austrians, four English, and sixteen belong to Latin nations other than Italy. These could exert a very powerful influence on the election if they would act together, but of this there is no chance. They are sure to be divided, so that the Romans and Italians will hold the balance of power, which is another way of saying that the contest will be between Italy and Germany, for Germany dominates among the Romans as Italy does among the Italians. There has been a very widespread disposition in Europe, since the capture of Rome by the Italians, to treat the political importance of the Pope to foreign nations as a thing of the past; but the recent Papal meddling in the German elections shows that Popes may still take a hand in electioneering with more or less effect, and that it is still worth the while of States containing a considerable Catholic population to bring influence to bear on the Conclave. If Bismarck feels that he has really owed something to the Pope's support in the recent canvass, there is little doubt that he or his successor will try to have a German candidate for the place of Leo XIII., and push him by any of the means which have hitherto been successful in helping the cardinals to a choice.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, March 2, to TUESDAY, March 8, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE Forty-ninth Congress adjourned on March 4, as required by law. There was as usual an all-night session preceding the day of adjournment, and much important business was transacted during the closing hours. The most important measure among the last that were enacted was the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office acts, whereby the power is restored to the President of making removals from office at all times without the consent of the Senate, a power which the Presidents before Andrew Johnson had. The bill for the redemption of trade dollars and the Anti-Polygamy Bill became laws without the President's signature. The River and Harbor Bill failed to become a law, because it was not signed by the President within the required time, and neither the Fortification Bill of the House nor that of the Senate was passed, because of a disagreement in the Conference Committee. After an unfavorable report by the Committee on the District of Columbia, the Senate confirmed the nomination of James M. Trotter, of Massachusetts, the second colored man selected by the President to be Recorder of Deeds of the District.

The bill authorizing the President to take severe retaliatory measures against Canada, which is a product of the fisheries dispute, was signed by the President before Congress adjourned. The Montreal Gazette, commenting on it, says that it does "not know whether the solution of the fisheries trouble will be made more difficult or rendered easier" by this action; and it adds: "Canada feels that she is right. She cannot agree to yield to coercion, in whatever form it may be presented, the advantages that by her construction of the treaty pertain exclusively to her own people." The British press has made no comment.

The Committee of the House of Representatives which made an investigation of the strike last year of railway employees in the Southwest, has reported that the loss to the 9,000 strikers was $900,000; to the non-striking employees, who were deprived of work, not less than $500,000; and to the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, $2,800,000.

Gen. J. J. Finley has been appointed by Gov. Perry of Florida United States Senator to succeed Charles W. Jones, whose term expired on March 4. Gen. Finley has been a judge of the Supreme Court of Florida and a member of Congress.

The long deadlock in the New Jersey Legislature caused by the effort to elect a United States Senator to succeed Senator Sewell was ended March 2 by the selection of Rufus Blodgett, Democrat, who is Superintendent of the New York and Long Branch Railroad.

The Democratic State Convention of Rhode Island on March 8 nominated John W. Davis, of Pawtucket, for Governor.

An investigation of the conduct of the municipal government of Brooklyn by a special committee of the New York Assembly was begun on March 4.

The Supreme Court of the United States on March 7 handed down a decision in a case brought from Tennessee, which involved the right of one State or municipality to impose a license tax on travelling salesmen from another State seeking to sell goods by sample or otherwise. The decision is that such taxation is an interference with inter-State commerce, and is, therefore, unconstitutional.

There is a threatening strike by employees of the railroad companies at Youngstown, O., which was begun by the brakemen on the freight trains of one road, who insisted that an extra man should be employed on all freight and yard "crews." The conductors and brakemen on other roads joined the strikers on Monday and demanded higher wages. A blockade of freight was caused, and fears are entertained of a general strike of railway employees on the great through-lines west of Pittsburgh.

The printers belonging to the Typographical Union in all the newspaper and job-printing offices in Milwaukee struck on March 2, and their places were soon filled by non-union printers.

Quiet has not yet been permanently restored in Cambridge, Mass., where the street-car drivers have so long been on a strike. On Sunday one horse-car was almost wrecked, and the driver was badly hurt.

Several hundred plasterers of Pittsburgh have seceded from the Knights of Labor because of the expensiveness of membership therein.

During the winter hog-packing season, which recently closed in Chicago, 700,000 fewer hogs were killed than during the last season. The cause of this decrease was the great strike at the stock yards and its effect upon the Chicago market. The loss in wages is computed at $700,000, and at least 5,000 men, skilled and unskilled, who were employed last season, failed to find work.

A large meeting of Socialists was held in Chicago on Sunday, to discuss a measure pending in the Illinois Legislature to punish the authors of inflammatory speeches or writings. Very radical addresses were delivered in English, German, and Bohemian. Currlin, editor of the Arbeiter Zeitung, advised his hearers to procure arms and carry them. Another speaker, an Englishman, declared that the Socialists had a right to preach treason and the overthrow of society and the constituted authorities. Sooner than see the bill pass, he would take arms in hand and preach revolution.

Three unsuccessful efforts to destroy the property of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Jersey City were made on March 4 and 5. On one of the ferry-boats that run between Jersey City and Courtlandt Street, New York, a bottle was found which contained a combustible substance, and two appliances for setting fire to the Jersey City depot were discovered.

The total snowfall at Minneapolis this winter has been 68½ inches, and there have been 104 days of continuous sleighing. Between Mankato and Tracy, Minn., the snow drifts are in many cases six feet above the tops of the telegraph poles. In Newcastle and Chatham, New Brunswick, the snow is piled up to the second-story windows of houses, and communication with outlying points has been almost entirely cut off.

The overflow of the Mississippi River has inundated many miles of railroad between Memphis and Madison, Ark. The west bank of the river, from its confluence with the Missouri to Memphis, is almost wholly under water.

The Texas express on the Iron Mountain Railroad, which left St. Louis on Saturday night, plunged through a bridge over Joachim Creek, drowning two persons and wounding twenty-five. A freshet had undermined the supports of the bridge.

There is alarm over the attitude of the Indians in Rolette County, Dak., where the half-breeds have refused to pay their taxes, and the militia has been ordered to be ready for service.

Harvard College has received a large sum of money, known as the Boyden bequest, which will be devoted to astronomical research in the southern hemisphere. The suggestion in the will, that the expenditure of the income shall be for investigations in high altitudes as free as possible from adverse atmospheric influences, leaves the trustees perfectly free to select a site anywhere in the world that may be deemed most desirable. It is probable that some elevation of the Andes range in Peru will be chosen. Prof. Edward C. Pickering will have charge of the new observatory.

Prof. E. R. Sill, who was an occasional contributor to the Nation, both as a reviewer and as a correspondent, died at Cleveland, O., on February 27. He was graduated at Yale in 1861, in a class that has perhaps contributed more professors to the colleges of the country than any other college class that ever graduated. He was for several years Professor of English Literature in the University of California, but resigned not long after President Gilman left it for Johns Hopkins University. After the resignation of his professorship he retired to Cuyahoga Falls, O., and led the life of a close student. Some of those best qualified to judge believe that in his premature death American thought as well as American letters has sustained a grievous loss.

The wife of Senator Beck, of Kentucky, died in Washington on Sunday. She was the grand-niece and nearest living descendant of George Washington. Mrs. Ruth Harmon, maternal grandmother of Mrs. Grover Cleveland, died at her home in Jackson, Mich., on the same day. Charles J. Peterson, the Philadelphia publisher, died on March 4.

Commodore Edward P. Lull, United States Navy, who died at Pensacola, Fla., on March 5, was born in Vermont in 1836, and had spent his life in the naval service. He served on board the Brooklyn at the battle of Mobile Bay, August 5, 1864. In 1872–'74 he commanded the expedition which surveyed a route for a ship canal across the Isthmus of Nicaragua.

The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher died at his residence in Brooklyn on March 8, of apoplexy. He was born June 24, 1813.

FOREIGN.

After many months of quiet in the East, the condition of Bulgaria has again threatened the peace of Europe. There have been revolts against the Government of the Regency which it is suspected were instigated by Russia. The telegraphic reports are conflicting in details, but the following facts have been reported directly from Sofia as well as from most of the European capitals. On February 28 there was an insurrection at Silistria. The Government of the town was seized by the insurgents. Loyalist troops from adjacent towns, most of them from Rustchuk, suppressed the revolt. The commander of the garrison was killed, and perhaps others. While the troops were absent from Rustchuk a more formidable revolt was made there. The barracks were seized, the officers were arrested, but the people took arms against the insurgents, and the fighting continued throughout Wednesday, March 2. Then the insurgents, who were attempting to retreat across the Danube, were compelled by the heavy firing from the shore to desert their boats and take refuge on an island. Most of them were wounded and all were captured, and the authority of the Regents was restored. The killed and wounded at Rustchuk numbered 100. Rumors have come of insurrections at other garrisons. These revolts have caused fresh preparations for war to be made by all the Governments most directly interested. The Emperor of Austria has held a military council, and decided to appoint several officers for the superior commands in the event of war. Wooden huts for troops have been erected in Galicia. Servia has sent troops to the frontier. From St. Petersburg, military movements towards the Galician frontier are reported to be continuous. Significance is attached to the statement by the Journal de St.-Petersbourg that "Russia considers the occurrences at Silistria a fresh proof of Bulgaria's abnormal condition."

Nine officers and civilians concerned in the revolt at Rustchuk were shot on Sunday. The news comes by way of Paris that the political prisoners arrested in Sofia for participation in the revolt, were whipped with knouts during the entire night following their arrest, and that five officers died from the effects of this torture.

The Bulgarian revolt and the universal suspicion that it was instigated by Russia have caused continued discussion of war, no longer between France and Germany, but between Russia and Austria-Hungary. The Kölnische Zeitung (Berlin) warns Russia that even German patience towards neighbors has limits, and says: "If Russia compels Germany to take account of a Franco-Russian agreement, let her beware lest she may herself have to consider a hostile Germany." And the Kreuz-Zeitung reports that letters from St. Petersburg state that the general hatred of Germany and the popularity of France are becoming a sort of violent epidemic in Russia.

The new German Reichstag was opened on March 3. The Emperor's speech was read from the throne. He expressed gratification at the benevolent disposition the Pope had shown, and asserted that the foreign policy of the empire was continually directed to the maintenance of peace, especially with Germany's neighbors. The Reichstag was further assured that if, without hesitation or division, it gives unanimous expression to the resolve that the nation will put forth its full strength now and at all times against any attack upon the frontiers, such resolution, even before carried out, will materially strengthen the guarantees of peace and remove the doubts which the late parliamentary debates may have inspired. In diplomatic circles the speech was considered more peaceable than had been expected, but the Liberal newspapers of Berlin have said that the vague reference to foreign relations is not likely to calm the public mind. On March 4, Herr Wedell Presdorf was elected President of the Reichstag. Dr. Windthorst protested against the election of a President before the second ballots were concluded. Minister von Bötticher replied that any such criticism was an encroachment upon the rights of the Emperor, because when his Majesty summoned the Reichstag the members were bound to appear. The complete returns of the German elections (including the second elections) are: Conservative 81, Imperialist 39, National Liberal 100, Centre 97, New German Liberal 34, Polish 15, Protester 15, Socialist 11, Guelph 4, and Danish 1. Total, 397. There were cast 1,877,969 more votes than at the preceding general election. The increases are: Conservative 333,441, Imperialist 305,508, National Liberals 661,125, Democratic 13,481 Centre 248,701, Polish 9,438, Socialist 224,192, Protester 82,083. There was a decrease in the New German Liberal vote of 447,702. The Emperor, upon hearing the result of the elections, remarked that the news made him feel twenty years younger, and that the people could not have made him a handsomer birthday present.

The Septennate Bill was introduced in the Reichstag on March 7 by Gen. von Schellendorf, Minister of War, who said in his speech: "Let us forget what has passed. There is no doubt about the acceptance of the bill, but the greater the majority it receives the more significant will be its success." Herr Richter, the new German Liberal leader, declared his intention to reintroduce his former motions, and, if they should be rejected, to vote against the Septennate Bill. The Socialists condemned the bill on account of the great financial burden it imposed upon the people. The final passage of the measure is now a matter of form. No new taxes will be levied to meet the additional expense, which will be covered by a loan.

The Emperor of Germany has ordered a deputation from the Czar's Prussian regiment, equipped with the new repeating rifles, to present themselves before the Czar at Gatchina on the Emperor's birthday.

Gen. Boulanger has issued an order forbidding any officer of the French army to have in his service a foreigner of either sex. This order was provoked by Gen. Davoust, who had as governess for his children the wife of a German officer.

Paul Henri Féval, one of the most prolific of French writers of fiction, died March 8, in his seventieth year. His 'Mysteries of London,' edited and mainly written by him for M. Joly, was the talk of its day, ran through twenty editions, and was translated into several languages. After 1855 Feval turned his attention to historical writing, and published a 'History of the Ministry,' and a 'History of the Parliamentary Government of France.' He continued to write fiction, however, producing a novel a year for the greater part of his active life.

On March 5 the resignation was announced of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach from the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he was succeeded by the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, Secretary of State for Scotland, who is a nephew of Lord Salisbury. Sir Michael is suffering with cataract over both eyes, but the real cause of his retirement is thought to be his breaking down under the uncommon mental strain of the post of Secretary for Ireland in the Conservative Cabinet.

Preceding and following Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's resignation, the Irish question caused very spirited discussion in and out of Parliament. There was an angry debate in the House of Commons on March 3 between Sir Michael and Mr. Dillon about the vote of £30,000 for the Irish police, for which the Government asked and which was granted. Mr. Dillon said that the greater portion of the money hitherto granted had been spent in endeavoring to suppress public meetings and in carrying on the work of eviction; and that the Government avoided indicating the sums spent on evictions. Sir Michael contended that the expenditures for the Irish police were necessary to maintain order, and he declared that the speech which Mr. Dillon had just made afforded additional proof of the absolute necessity of giving further powers to the Government, and he concluded his speech with a threat of military force in Ireland. Cries, shouts, and defiant gestures were freely exchanged by both sides of the House.

The Marquis of Lothian has been selected as Mr. Balfour's successor as Secretary of State for Scotland. When Mr. Balfour, the new Secretary for Ireland, arrived at Dublin on March 7, the Municipal Council adopted a resolution to appeal to the free people of the world to prevent the British Government from carrying out their "threats of outrage against the Irish people.'

The British Cabinet at a special meeting decided to end the closure debate before the production of the Crimes Bill, to restrict the latter to clauses dealing with the changing of venue of jury trials and magistrates' powers in cases involving sentences of not more than six months, and not to prosecute Archbishop Croke. Lord Ashbourne has finished the Land Bill, extending the powers of purchase, and substituting five years' judicial leases for leases of fifteen years. Outside Parliament and the Cabinet meeting there has been no less active discussion. In letters and speeches, Viscount Lymington has protested against the Government's want of action, nerve, and courage, in paralyzing the Liberal-Unionist treatment of the Irish question. Sir William Vernon Harcourt has insisted that the troubles in Ireland arise from the attempt of the Government to enforce the payment of rents which their own land commission has declared the people are unable to pay; and Mr. Gladstone has repeated his conviction that "no great political matter can be dealt with till the Irish difficulty is settled." In a speech before the National Conservative Club on Saturday Lord Salisbury declared that the law machine in Ireland was paralyzed, because a jury refused to act, and that, before society could be restored to a healthy condition, that wheel must either be refitted or dispensed with; but nothing was possible until the efficiency of Parliament was restored.

In the country near Limerick a number of houses occupied by tenants, together with the out-buildings, were burned on the night of March 3, by armed incendiaries, who escaped. All the victims were persons who had paid their rents, and the outrages were thought by the people to have political significance, and the excitement was thus made the greater.

Archbishop Croke has written in explanation of his attitude on the Irish rent question that he has proposed nothing, nor made any recommendations about taxes; that he simply expressed an opinion concerning the relative value of a no-tax manifesto and a no-rent manifesto; that it never entered his head to recommend a general uprising against the payment of taxes, and that he trusts alone to constitutional agitation for the restoration of national rights in Ireland.

The first of Queen Victoria's jubilee drawing-room receptions was held at Buckingham Palace on March 3. The attendance was greater than at any preceding reception of the kind during the long reign of the Queen. Crowds congregated in the parks and roadways around the palace numbered many thousands, and court officials say that the reception was the most brilliant they ever attended.

A foreman employed in the Government works at Chatham, England, and a draughtsman have been dismissed for revealing important secret naval designs to the United States and Russian Governments.

George Franklin Anderson, an American, was convicted in London, on March 4, of swindling a client out of large sums of money under the pretence that he was prosecuting a suit for the recovery of a large English estate, which he had made his client believe he had inherited; and he was sentenced to five years' penal servitude. On the same day George F. Parker, Edwin S. Witherall, and George W. Gibbens, officers of a "British-American-Claim Agency," were arrested in New York on a charge of carrying on similar swindling operations.

King Oscar of Sweden has dissolved the Diet for refusing to vote the estimates asked by the Government.

A Nihilist plot has been discovered in Finland, and many students and artisans have been arrested in Uleaborg and Abo charged with conspiracy.

King Leopold on March 2 inspected a monument to Gen. Gordon, which has just been cast and which is to be set up in Westminster Abbey.

An explosion of fire damp in a colliery at Quaregnon, in Brussels, March 5, entombed the miners, 144 of whom were suffocated.

The Queen of Spain has signed a decree making a 20 per cent. reduction in the export duties on sugar and tobacco shipped from Cuba.

A general election was held in Portugal on Sunday. The returns show the election of 108 Government and 36 Opposition Deputies. Two Republicans were elected in Lisbon.

The Pope has selected Mgr. Rampolla, the Nuncio at Madrid, to succeed the late Cardinal Jacobini as Pontifical Secretary of State.

Another slight shock of earthquake was felt at Nice on March 3, and at Charleston, S. C., on the same day. The people at Diano-Marina fear further disasters because the sea has not returned to its ordinary level. On March 5, a series of rather violent shocks were felt in Western Morea, in Greece. The inhabitants were terrified and many fled from the district.

The first steamer to pass the whole length of the Suez Canal by aid of the electric light did so on March 3 in fifteen hours.

It was reported from Bombay on March 3 that the Ameer of Afghanistan is making efforts to raise a new army. Boys between the ages of ten and eighteen years are drilling for service, and nearly all the able-bodied men are enrolled. The Ameer has issued a circular to his subjects telling them to prepare for a holy war. It was reported and subsequently denied that he contemplates a war against Russia.

Advices received by the Canadian Department of Agriculture indicate that the influx of immigrants from Europe to Canada will be greater this year than ever before.

WHAT MR. CLEVELAND HAS DONE.

Mr. Cleveland's term is half gone. The occasion is appropriate for a review of his career in the White House.

First and most important among the achievements of his Administration must be accounted his contribution to the reform of the civil service, and its reëstablishment upon the business basis where Washington, Jefferson, and the other Presidents who were among the founders of the Republic, placed it. Mr. Cleveland came into power as the representative of a party which had long been in the opposition. The last previous change of party administration, when Lincoln was inaugurated had been characterized, like all others before it back to Jackson's day, by a "clean sweep" of the office-holders found in power. It was held, in 1861, that a man ought to lose his place simply because he was a Democrat and the new President was a Republican, just as in 1849 it had been held that a man "must go" because he was a Democrat, and a Whig had been elected President. Mr. Cleveland would only have followed precedent if he had turned all the Republicans out within three months. A large proportion of the Democratic party—and of the Republican party, too, for that matter—held that this was what Mr. Cleveland should have done in the spring of 1885, just as Republicans had maintained and Democrats had admitted, in 1861, that Lincoln ought to make a clean sweep, "according to the rules of war." For this was what politics in the United States had become before the advent of civil-service reform—a succession of pitched battles for the spoils, public office being regarded not as a public trust, but as a partisan possession, to be fought for every four years.

What has Mr. Cleveland done? In the great post-offices of the country, which are the Federal offices that come home most closely to the people, he has allowed Republican incumbents to serve out their terms, except where offensive partisanship had forfeited claims to consideration, and now in 1887 the postmasters in scores of cities and large towns remain the same as when Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated. This is also true in the case of not a few other important Federal officials throughout the country, like the United States Marshals in Boston and Brooklyn, for two examples, while a considerable proportion of the chief bureau officials in the Washington departments still remain unchanged. Fully a third of the officials left in the consular service by Arthur retain their places. The thousands of clerks who were in the departments on the 4th of March, 1885, retain their places save where they have forfeited them through good cause. So also of the clerks in several great post-offices, like those in New York, Brooklyn, and Boston, and in the great Custom-houses in New York and Boston. A considerable percentage of the small post-offices throughout the country—as nearly as we can estimate, from the records for the last fiscal year, at least a third of the more than 50,000—have gone unchanged. Including all these various classes, it would appear that at least 30,000, and probably the number is nearer 40,000, of the 120,000 offices must still be held by the Republicans who occupied them two years ago.

Mr. Cleveland has thus overthrown the doctrine of a "clean sweep" throughout the country upon a change in party administration at Washington. And he has overthrown it for all time. A Republican President may succeed a Democratic in 1889, but he will not be able to do what the Republican President who succeeded a Democratic in 1861 did. He will not be able to do so because the public sentiment of the country will never again sustain, or even permit, a system of universal changes in the offices with a change of party representatives in the White House. Mr. Cleveland has not merely scotched the snake of a "clean sweep"—he has killed it. This is a great and permanent achievement, sufficient of itself always to distinguish Mr. Cleveland's Administration in history were death to end it to-day—an achievement in the face of a pressure so tremendous that those who did not know the man, might well have supposed him incapable of resisting it.

But Mr. Cleveland has done more than this for the reform. He has secured the execution of the Civil-Service Law, not merely in its letter, but in its spirit, in the Washington departments, in the chief custom-house and post-office in the country, and in other important custom-houses and post-offices. The two great business establishments of the Government in New York city are now conducted upon business principles; the same is true of Boston and Brooklyn and of some smaller cities. It is not true of the great Federal offices in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Indianapolis, and other places. Mr. Cleveland has been inconsistent; he has yielded occasionally to the influence of spoilsmen; he has thus much lowered the average which would otherwise have risen so very high. But, making all due allowances for these failures, it still remains true that he has established a firm foothold for the system of a business Administration. The system can never be dislodged in what were once the conspicuous strongholds of "patronage" where it is now entrenched, and it must inevitably, sooner or later, make conquest of the rest.

Mr. Cleveland has done the country a great service by taking a firm and pronounced stand against paternalism in government. The drift in this dangerous direction of late years had become steady and strong. There was a growing disposition on the part of everybody to resort to the general Government for anything—for school money in Southern States if it was hard for the States themselves to raise what was needed; for the support of any man in the North who ever had any connection with the army if he was now in trouble; for contributions of the public funds for any community which might have fallen into distress, through flood, drought, or other misfortune. The Pauper Pension Bill and the Texas Seed Bill embodied these vicious tendencies, and Mr. Cleveland's vetoes of those twin measures taught the same lesson to North and South alike. That lesson is, that "though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people," and its reception by the country shows that it will be learned. The President has not merely blocked a petty $10,000 appropriation for Texas, or saved the Treasury from a tremendous onslaught of pension-beggars, but he has recalled the nation to its senses, and revived that "sturdiness of our national character" which appeared to be dangerously weakening.

Mr. Cleveland has removed the sectional and race issues from our politics. Hundreds of thousands of Republicans feared his accession to power chiefly because they dreaded the supremacy of the Solid South, and apprehended untold ills for the negro. Two years have sufficed to dispel these fears. The leading Republican papers of the North have endorsed the pension veto and declared that it ought to be sustained, and then they have seen it sustained chiefly by Southern votes, through the fear of "the soldier vote" on the part of Northern demagogues in Congress. After such an experience they can never raise the sectional howl successfully again. Indeed, it is admitted by all candid Republicans that the bloody shirt is buried. The best friends of the negro—such men as Gen. Armstrong of the Hampton Institute, for example, who has just described a tour through the South—bear witness that "a better feeling between the races is setting in," while the President's controversy with the Senate, regarding his colored nominees for Recorder of Deeds in Washington, has opened the eyes of the negro voters to the hypocrisy of Republican pretences in their behalf, and insured a division of the colored vote in 1888.

Mr. Cleveland has given the country a much-needed exhibition of courage and honesty in public life. His veto of the Pauper Pension Bill was a brave act, which was emphasized by the cowardice of the Congressmen who voted against their convictions to pass the bill over the veto, in obedience to the clamor of claim agents and Grand Army posts. The impression which he has made upon the country is that of an honest man who is trying to do his duty—making mistakes, committing blunders, turning from the straight line, at times, but on the whole holding pretty steadily to his course and making decided progress.

THE FORTY-NINTH CONGRESS.

The Congress which expired at noon on Friday failed to discharge the chief duty imposed upon it. It found the revenues of the country far outrunning the reasonable requirements for the efficient support of the Government, and the public demanding a reduction of the surplus through a reform of the tariff—a demand so general that even the Republican party had felt bound to place in its national platform for the campaign in which this Congress was elected, this promise: "The Republican party pledges itself to correct the irregularities of the tariff and to reduce the surplus." But the Congress has expired without having done anything towards such a reduction of the surplus, which is equivalent to saying that it has neglected the most pressing of all its obligations.

This failure must always constitute a serious reproach upon the record of the Forty-ninth Congress. But it must not blind the country to the fact that this Congress has rendered the public great services, both positively and negatively. Two of the acts which it has placed upon the statute-book are of the epoch-marking order, while a third bill repeals an act which was of the epoch-marking order. First of these is the act regulating the order of Presidential succession. The old law, which dates back to Washington's first term, provided that in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of both the President and Vice-President, the President of the Senate should become acting President until the disability were removed or a new President elected; or if there were, in such an emergency, no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House should thus temporarily occupy the Executive chair. As either the Senate or the House might represent in its majority the party opposed to the President and Vice-President, it has repeatedly happened that if the occupant of the White House had died during the term for which he and his associate on the ticket had been elected, a representative of the party which he defeated in that election would have become President for the period until a new election could be held, which might cover more than a year. This has always been an anomaly in our system, the injustice of which has long been recognized, but it was reserved for the Forty-ninth Congress to remove it from the statute-book and substitute the rational and just plan of devolving the succession upon the members of the Cabinet, in the order of their relative rank, beginning with the Secretary of State, and abolishing the requirement of a new election by the people before the regular time; thus insuring the administration of the executive department throughout a four-years term by the party to which the voters had intrusted it.

Not less important is the law which provides for counting the electoral vote. The system which had been maintained for nearly a century, dating from the same period in Washington's Administration, was fatally ambiguous and defective. Its radical faults had more than once provoked controversies in Congress during the counting of the electoral votes, when such controversies were rather academic than practical, and in 1876-77 its fundamental weakness threatened the peace of the country. Yet it has taken ten years—during two of which the Republicans have controlled both branches of Congress, during two the Democrats both, and during six each party one house—to secure the enactment of an efficient substitute for this broken-down old law. The act finally adopted proceeds upon the sound principles of exerting all proper pressure upon the States to settle controversies themselves, accepting the decisions of the State tribunals as final whenever only one return of votes is made to Congress, and providing that in case of two or more returns that return shall be counted which is supported by the certificate of the State executive, unless the two houses, acting separately, shall concur in deciding that it is not the lawful vote of the State.

These two important additions to the statute-book are fitly supplemented by the removal of an act which has long disgraced it. The Tenure-of-Office Act, passed in what was considered a desperate emergency twenty years ago, infringed upon the prerogative of absolute removal from office which had previously been exercised by Presidents, and which is obviously essential to Executive responsibility, by prohibiting the removal of any officer confirmed by the Senate without the Senate's consent. To require the consent of the Senate for the removal of officers as well as for their appointment was but a natural expression of a deep-seated distrust of lodging absolute power in any one person. True, the act was not passed until 1867, and then as a specific check on the power of Andrew Johnson; but twice before in the history of the country, in 1789 and 1835, it only just failed of passage, and it was sure to be agitated from time to time by the same ultra-democratic spirit which has weakened so many of our State constitutions because it cannot recognize that when divided power means divided responsibility, it results in a system of log-rolling and bargaining, and gives rise to a shrewd class of manipulators or bosses who "fix things" and "work things," and yet are never seen; who have the power and yet cannot be held responsible to the voters, and thus, under the forms of democracy, rule as an oligarchy, and leave to the people the privilege of fighting blindly in the dark. Twenty years of the Tenure-of-Office Act have spread unmistakable evidence upon the record that giving the Senate a voice in removals has simply extended the system of log-rolling, which has always been the bane of the service; and that, instead of preventing the President from removing good men, it has made it difficult to oust bad ones.

Here, then, are three great positive achievements, through the passage of bills each of distinct advantage to the public service. With them must be ranked two great negative achievements, through the defeat or suppression of bills. For some years the disposition of demagogues to outbid each other by higher and higher offers for "the soldier vote," through unfair and unreasonable extensions of the pension system, has been an alarming tendency. Nobody seemed to have the courage to call a halt, and things went from bad to worse, until they culminated a few weeks ago in the passage of the Dependent Pension Bill—a measure which offered such bribes to all old soldiers not now receiving pensions as must inevitably have demoralized a large proportion of them into turning paupers, in order to get supported at the public expense. Mr. Cleveland fortunately possessed the moral courage to veto this bill, and 125 out of 300 members of the House voted to sustain him, thus sharing with him the distinction of placing an effective check upon the pension craze.

Another tendency, no less alarming, towards paternalism in Government, has also met an effective check. When the late Congress opened, a scheme which involved Federal intervention in education in the States was promptly brought forward and pushed through the Senate, as it had been pushed through the Senate two years before, not because a majority of the Senators believed it wise—for Mr. Plumb of Kansas declared, without even Mr. Blair's challenging the truth of his assertion, that he could count on the fingers of his two hands "the members on this floor who are actually in favor of this measure"—but because a majority had thoughtlessly committed themselves to it in the past. It went to the House with the expectation that the thoughtless committal of many Northern Republicans to the idea that Federal appropriations for Southern schools would benefit the negroes, combined with the temptations to Southern Democrats of a $77,000,000 bribe, would carry it through. But meanwhile the nature and character of the "Bill to Promote Mendicancy" had been thoroughly exposed; the country had become convinced that the scheme would work harm rather than good; and, with the approval of such intelligent and unselfish friends of negro education as Gen. Armstrong of the Hampton Institute, the measure was killed in the House—killed, we say, because this was its last chance of success. In the session of 1887–88 a plea for Federal appropriations to Southern schools, on the ground that the South is still "impoverished by the war," and that she cannot herself sustain her schools, will be laughed out of Congress by quotations from the wonderful reports of educational progress contained in the reports of Southern school superintendents, and by citations from the celebrations of Southern prosperity which enliven every issue of a Southern newspaper.

These are, in our view, the half-dozen great features of the Forty-ninth Congress. A failure in its chief duty of tariff reform; three positive achievements of the first order in the passage of the Presidential Succession and Electoral Count Bills, and the repeal of the Tenure-of Office Act; and two negative achievements of equal rank, in the arrest of the pension craze and the defeat of the Federal education scheme. Next after these in importance, perhaps, is to be ranked the Inter-State Commerce Bill—an experiment in Federal legislation regarding railways the workings of which will be awaited with great interest. The law granting lands in severalty to Indians marks a long step forward in the solution of the Indian problem. The passage of a bill authorizing a building for the Congressional Library is cause for congratulation. The drastic law for the suppression of polygamy will undoubtedly be carried as soon as possible before the Supreme Court for a judgment as to its constitutionality, of which there are grave doubts. The act referring all private claims, which have long occupied an unreasonable share of the time of Congress, to the Court of Claims, is an important measure of reform in legislative methods. The steady improvement in the postal service receives another impetus in the acts extending the free-delivery system to all places of 10,000 inhabitants, and reducing the fees on postal money orders. The worst bill to set over against these is the one redeeming trade dollars under conditions which will give a profit estimated at more than $4,500,000 to the speculators, and will increase the amount of standard silver dollars that are not needed and will not circulate—a bill which Mr. Cleveland would have done well to veto.

This constitutes on the whole an exceptionally good record. In considering the credit and blame for this record, it must be remembered that tariff reform was supported by three-fourths of the Democrats, and defeated only by the coalition of nearly all the Republicans with the Randall wing; that the Presidential Succession and Electoral Count Bills were non-partisan in their inception and progress; that the repeal of the Tenure-of-Office Act was opposed by most of the Republicans in both branches; that the sustaining of the pension veto was due solely to Democratic votes, and that it was the Democratic House which suppressed the Blair scheme. Republican organs will berate the Democratic House for its "inefficiency," and it deserves plenty of such censure; but in common fairness it must be remembered that the country owes the good work of the session to the Democratic House in far greater measure than to the Republican Senate.

THE MONEY POWER IN POLITICS AGAIN.

We gave in condensed form last week a startling array of exact statistical information which Mr. W. M. Ivins had for the first time made public, concerning the amounts of money involved in one way or another in our municipal contests. The central fact in the whole matter, it will be recalled, is, that in every city election there is involved in money, in round numbers, $1,500,000. Of this amount about $500,000 is actually paid out on election day, consisting of $290,000 which is paid by the city as legal expenses, and $210,000 which is contributed by the candidates as "assessments." The remaining million is the stake for which the politicians are contending in the election, and consists of $750,000 as salaries for hangers-on and "heelers," and $250,000 as salaries for district leaders. It should be remembered that these are all minimum figures. In national elections the amounts are in all instances much higher, for not only are the stakes played for much greater, but the outlays by the city and by the candidates and parties are greatly increased. Then, too, Mr. Ivins only takes into account the city salaries which are paid to the men actually engaged in political work. The aggregate of Federal salaries paid in New York city is $2,500,000, and the aggregate of municipal salaries is about $10,000,000. Here is a total of $12,500,000 in salaries alone, and this is one of the prizes which the various Machine bosses are fighting to get "a hack at."

It is easy to see how such conditions have led to the building up of our present political Machines. They were an absolute necessity, from the nature of the case. The State has neglected to provide any election machinery beyond that for registering, receiving, and recording the vote. There is no State provision for printing and circulating ballots, and to perform this work the Machines were put in motion, and, to pay their expenses, the assessments upon candidates followed naturally. As the city increased in size, the expenses also increased, and larger assessments became constantly necessary. It would be a gross injustice to many honorable candidates to intimate that there has been any criminal intent on their part in paying these assessments. The larger part of the money undoubtedly goes in every election to the payment of legitimate expenses. But the great evil of the system is that it is a constant temptation to corruption and greed. It leads naturally to a sale of nominations to the highest bidder. The men who do the work on election day are also the men who make the nominations. Naturally, they desire for candidates men who will make the most liberal contributions before election, and also the most liberal promises of aid and support at the city's expense after election. The only check upon this tendency which the honest sentiment of the city can exert is by defeating at the ballot-box men who are notoriously unfit. This operates strongly enough in times of unusual interest to secure for us good candidates for Mayor and a few of the higher offices, but beyond that it has little or no influence.

The assessment evil is the most pernicious of all. It sometimes puts upon the benches of our courts men who would never have been thought of for judges if they had not been able to buy a nomination. It puts into our county offices men whose chief merit is that they will pledge themselves to use the office to its utmost capacity for the benefit of the politicians. Then, too, a man who has paid a heavy assessment before getting into office is bound to devote all his energies to getting back his money out of the office, if there is any possible way for him to do so. A striking illustration of the way John Kelly used his political power to help supply deficiencies in his assessment funds was revealed a few years ago. A former President of the Excise Board stated that during his term of office, while Tammany had a majority in the Board, John Kelly gave that majority orders to allow no license to be granted unless the applicant could show receipts for two subscriptions to the Star newspaper, which Mr. Kelly owned. In this way the Tammany leader accomplished two things, in addition to getting about 6,000 subscribers to his paper—he succeeded in getting the Star into the greater part of the liquor-saloons, and in keeping out of them every other Democratic paper, for a liquor-dealer who had to pay two subscriptions to one paper was not likely to take any other.

The remedy for the present evils is plain enough, and happily it is not an experimental one. It consists simply in putting the election machinery in charge of the State, on the same plan which has worked so successfully in England. The printing and distributing of ballots should be done at the State's expense, and, in addition to that, anti-bribery laws like the English should be enacted. Previous to 1883 these English laws forbade the receipt of money for uses connected with elections, but in that year a law was passed which forbade the disbursement of more than a fixed amount proportionate to the size of the constituency. A borough constituency of 2,000 electors is allowed £350 sterling if one member of Parliament is to be chosen, and £525 if two are to be. The maximum sum for a borough of 66,000 electors is £3,000. This must cover all expenses—printing, postage, renting of rooms, agents—everything. All disbursements must be made by one person, either the candidate himself or his agent. If he employs an agent for the purpose, he must not disburse a farthing himself. An account with vouchers must be kept of all disbursements, and returned under oath after election. Penalties for paying more than the allowed sum are visited upon the candidate and the agent in the form of political disabilities, if the payment is not accompanied by bribery; if bribery be involved, the penalties for that offence are superadded.

This law demonstrated its wonderful efficacy immediately. At the preceding general election the sum of $7,500,000 was spent in campaigning and bribery of one form or another. In the first election under the law, there was only one case in which the money expended exceeded the limit allowed, and in this case the member elected was unseated. While in 1880, with 419 constituencies and with 3,000,000 voters, the expenditures had been $15,000,000, in 1885, with 611 constituencies and 5,670,000 voters, the expenditure was only $3,900,000. Ninety-five petitions alleging corrupt practices were presented in 1880, only two were presented in 1885, and in 1886 only one. Corruption in politics had been practically abolished. A similar law could not fail to work in the same way here. Modifications might be necessary to adapt it to our system of government, but they would be only slight. The main effect—that is, taking the machinery of nominations and elections out of the hands of the men who now control both, and control them for evil purposes—would be accomplished.

COUNTRY LIVING FOR CITY PEOPLE.

We have more than once urged upon innkeepers, and others engaged in providing for the great company of summer visitors to the country, the duty of getting out of the ruts in which that important business is usually "run." We have explained that if not strictly a duty (and indeed it can be esteemed so only figuratively, or, at most, in the way of what theologians call a counsel of perfection), this is, at any rate, a necessity, in order that the "summer-boarder" trade shall yield the highest amount of profit on one hand and a reasonable degree of satisfaction on the other. There is no other occupation of man that we can think of in which a little intelligence, a little reasoning, a little respect for plain facts, a little applied common sense, and a little courage will pay so well. To change thousands of dreary summer boarding-places into small paradises, it would suffice if their keepers would only change their point of view and acquire a trifle of knowledge. If they do not know, let them inquire and learn, what people in towns are used to and therefore must have; and what they are used to and therefore want to get rid of; and let them further learn to distinguish between these two classes of things. People in towns are used to baths, and they want baths; they are used to society, but they do not want that; they are gorged with society, and they want to be let alone, or at least to have the possibility of being alone, in comfort. It is not so necessary that the boarding-house keepers should know what people cannot have in towns, and therefore come to seek in the country, because in general these are things which the boarding-houses can neither supply nor take away.

We have not been much aided by our contemporaries in this useful missionary preaching. The subject, perhaps, wanted dignity in their eyes. But the New York, Ontario and Western Railway Company sees the importance of it in a business way, and, having regard to its own interest in the increase of summer travel to the wild and beautiful region through which its line runs, has undertaken the education of the rural mind in the art of living. To this end it has caused to be written by "Marion Harland," and has just published, under the title prefixed to this article, a little book of "Familiar Talk," full of really penetrative good sense, so wise and practical and well-directed that, wherever its advice on the proper care of summer boarders is followed, not only will their comfort and pleasure be greatly enlarged, but the ruralist's profit must be increased also. The railway company estimates that the summer visitors to Sullivan, Ulster, and Delaware Counties in 1886 expended there a sum equal to four-fifths of the total annual value of the farm products of those counties, and urges that this comparison shows that a good crop of summer boarders is "the best possible crop a thrifty farmer can raise"; but it "needs hearty effort to harvest this crop."

It is not often that our railway companies go to the bottom of things like this, and the travelling public will do well to see that the little book has a wide circulation, particularly in purely rural regions, where, as we all have often enough perceived, anxiously good intentions exist, together with sufficient means, but with total incapacity of producing pleasurable results, through pure ignorance of what is to be done and how to set about doing it. The value of Mrs. Terhune's advice is that she furnishes information under each of these heads, and in a very lucid manner. She addresses herself chiefly to the women, in a style which women will read with sympathy and understanding. Rather more than half of her book is given to the kitchen, being devoted mainly to recipes not too bright or good for human nature's daily food in a well-conditioned farm-house. The rest of it is directed to the care of the table and of bedrooms, and to suggestion of general principles, which is the most useful portion of all. That direful phrase, "all the comforts of a home," receives due discouragement—a phrase for which the not less familiar "all hope abandon" is a fair equivalent, since the only really hopeless "summer place" is the one where the idea thus expressed finds favor. "Sweep away from thought and from advertisement," says Mrs. Terhune, "the idea of giving the peculiar 'comforts' of a city home. Your best attempts would be a caricature."

We affirm entire agreement with Mrs. Terhune's principles and particulars. The comfort of a summer boarding-place lies almost wholly in making the most of its own peculiarities, and in sinking all rivalry with town luxuries. The air, the view, sun and shade, inviting places in which to sit or lie outdoors, tubs and towels, and plenty of water, profusion of the few vegetables or fruits which will not bear transportation (who ever really tastes green corn—and hardly green peas—in New York?), and all other products of the neighborhood marketed, on the house table — these are of the things which people seek for in the country. They are all easily to be furnished, but are rarely had, for want of thought and of management. Even for air and view, sun and shade, it is required that windows may open and shut easily, that they shall have blinds; that pigsties, and stables, and slop pools shall not be about the house. As for the other things, the bucolic mind is slow but tenacious, and it is knowledge of that which makes it worth urging that "p'doose" really fetches a price three times as high on the boarders' table as in Washington Market; that in a room a good bed, a comfortable chair, a decent reading-lamp, an honest table for washing, in place of the odorous "commode," a big can of water, a tin tub, and twice the usual supply of towels, will bring in, together, a clear addition of at least two dollars a week; that a good vegetable garden, not merely "put in," anyhow, in a spring hurry, and left to grow up to weeds, but early planted, and carefully tended, will be more profitable than any five acres of the farm besides; that New Yorkers do not want stale sea-fish in a mountain country, or look on bull-beef and ham as luxuries, but long for the frogs or trout or black bass or catfish, which the boys might catch close by the house; for poultry, for really new-laid eggs, etc., etc.

These are a few of the simple lessons which the bucolic mind in time will master; and when it does, life for a certain season of the year will wear a new face for most of us.

THE RÉMUSATS.

PARIS, February 25, 1887.

THE last two volumes (v and vi) of the correspondence of the Rémusats have just made their appearance. They extend from the year 1818 to the year 1821, in which year Mme. de Rémusat died in Paris. During this period M. de Rémusat was Prefect at Lille, but his son Charles was in Paris and was living in the most interesting society of the time. The letters of Mme. de Rémusat, as in the other volumes of this correspondence, are the best, in our opinion. She had a real epistolary talent, she knew how to touch every subject with a light hand; she was writing at that time the Memoirs which have already become famous, and which Taine considers one of the most valuable documents for the history of Bonaparte. About these Memoirs she writes to her son:

"Do you know a reflection which sometimes troubles me? I say to myself: 'If some day my son publishes all this, what will people think of me?' I am afraid some people will think me wicked or malicious. I do try to find occasions for praise; but that man [she means Bonaparte] has been such a destroyer [assommateur] of virtue, and we were so low, that often my soul feels discouraged and the truth presses me. I know nobody, nobody but you, to whom I should like to make such confidences."

The editor of the Memoirs adds here in a note: "We know, from other passages of her letters, that my grandmother accepted and even desired the posthumous publication of her Memoirs, and my father made this publication one of my duties."

Young Rémusat was a Liberal; he always had something to say against the ultras, against Chateaubriand and his friends. His mother was somewhat of the same idea. She said to him: "The aristocracy was radically destroyed in France before the establishment of a representative government. Our civilization created our middle classes, an enlightened bourgeoisie, the strength of France, and our Constitution is based on this fact." Her son answered thus, as a sort of echo:

"The Revolution, if we understand by this word the events of '89, did not destroy the nobility—the nobility no longer existed. It merely shook down the façade, which was still erect, of a building which had been demolished long before. The Terror passed a plough over these ruins, and the construction rapidly erected by Bonaparte has not survived him. . . . The ultras will be like the Jews, a society dispersed, foreign to the surrounding society. Bonaparte and those who would like to imitate him—that is to say, who would try to rebuild with the remains of the old monarchy—resemble the Emperor Julian trying to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem. There will issue from the earth flames which will devour the work and the laborers."

Rémusat had given himself body and soul to politics. He was the curious, intelligent, and disinterested witness of the first trial of parliamentary government in France. He was young, but cared not for the pleasures of youth. He spent most of his time at the Chamber and in the political drawing-rooms. He was full of illusions and had few prejudices. He was instinctively hostile to the ancien régime, and to the people who represented it. He thought that the time had arrived for a merely intellectual aristocracy, changing, going from hand to hand. He saw society in a state of perpetual transformation, and perceived no fixed laws, no fixed institutions anywhere. His mind was essentially fluid, and his opinions never took any definite form. Contradiction was for him not only an amusement, a necessity. The letters to his mother and of his mother to him are a sort of continuous duel, a duel of wit, of courtesy, of grace.

It is difficult to imagine the state of mind of a young man born to political life in the most terrible crisis, during the invasion of his country by foreigners, after the Revolution and the downfall of Bonaparte. Rémusat's mind had no fixed principles, though he attached himself to the little school of doctrinaires who pretended to make a code of principles for the government of the world. It was surely a great honor for him to be admitted to the familiarity of such men as the Duc de Broglie, who was one of the founders of the doctrinaire school; but he was not so much impressed with it that he could not write a very amusing song on his reception into that sacred cénacle. The song was called "The Neophyte," and had much success. It can be judged by this couplet:

> "Mais, repris-je d'un air timide,
> Quand vous vous assemblez ici
> Quel est l'intérêt qui vous guide?
> —Notre but, Monsieur, le voici:
> Ranger l'empire du possible
> Sous un gouvernement normal,
> Et sur le monde intelligible
> Exercer le pouvoir moral."

This is not a bad criticism of the high-sounding vagueness of the doctrinaires, and of their obscurity. The French mind was very ill prepared by the Revolution and by the Empire for a rational use of political and parliamentary liberties. The doctrinaires had to complete their own education before they could effect the education of the people; and the correspondence of the Rémusats shows how much the Chambers and the parties blundered. There was much good will among the men who supported the throne of Louis XVIII., much eloquence, much elevation; there was also much ignorance and prejudice. The Revolution had destroyed, in many senses, the national unity; it had broken all the old barriers, destroyed whatever had a provincial or even a municipal character; but it had divided the nation into victims and executioners, it had sown seeds of immortal hatred and of incurable jealousy.

It is almost impossible at such a distance to form a correct opinion of the state of France in 1818; some little touches in Mme. de Rémusat's letters are more eloquent than volumes "The ultras," she writes to her husband, "are mad with joy, and, as usual, very imprudent. Fancy our cousin, Mme. de Vergennes, going yesterday morning to see the King, and paying him a compliment on his having become a royalist. The epithets coquin, faquin, are given to every Liberal, whatever shade he belongs to." Imagine the Chancellor saying: "Thank God! we shall soon have no Chambers at all." The quarrels of M. de Richelieu and of M. Decazes divided society; they were really the quarrels between the old régime and the new.

An aunt of the Rémusats wrote to them a very solemn letter, blaming the young Charles for having written an article on Mme. de Staël, conceived in a liberal spirit: it seemed to her as if young Rémusat had become a real Jacobin in the society of such men as M. de Staël, the Duc de Broglie, Benjamin Constant—"people," said she, "whose approbation is very little honorable, and would be, for Charles, a misfortune." Young Charles had made his choice; he had thrown his lot among the progressive men of his time. "The simplest policy," he says to his mother, "is to start from the present and to conquer the future. But people are always speaking to us of the past; so the nation also throws herself on the past, and is almost ready to defend '93 because '89 is attacked." He attached himself to the new men, to the doctrinaires. "I assure you," he writes to his mother, "that the doctrinaires are remarkable, not only for their talent, but because they reveal to us a moral nature which is entirely new. It is a fine spectacle to see them claim liberty for mankind, not because it is convenient, but because it is just; fine to hear people ask for tolerance who need no tolerance. It is this spectacle which was wanting in France." M. Guizot was the rising star of the new school, and those who, like myself, knew him in his old age, can imagine with what an air, what a mien, he could say, in the discussion on a law for the protection of religion, to one of those who proposed the law: "Why, sir, do you mean to help with a torch the march of the sun?" Hitherto liberalism had been too irreligious. Tocqueville has well shown, in his book on the institutions of modern France, how the Revolution had been prepared by atheists or deists. Rémusat could write to his mother that "among the 250 members of the Chamber, there are at least 150 who only believe in Voltaire." Such men as Royer-Collard and Guizot were a novelty among all these Voltairians. The Voltarians wanted the altar simply as a basis for the throne: they had not the doctrinaire ideal of liberty associated with virtue and with religion.

Lille was a very small horizon for a woman like Mme. de Rémusat, but she was easily satisfied. She describes her little evening circle: "This circle is formed by a few ladies of this country and by officers of the Royal Guard, with their colonel at their head, who is the best and the most unreasonable of men. His name is D'Aubusson; he was once intoxicated with Bonaparte; he only understands a king on horseback, commanding a charge two hundred leagues away from his kingdom." She had her ultras: "Yesterday," says she, "I had my ultras at dinner. I amused myself by talking like a doctrinaire. 'You don't understand,' said I; 'do try to understand; don't always put men in the place of things.'" The poor ultras did not understand.

The Rémusats were not quite satisfied when their son became a regular contributor to a new paper called the Courrier Français, founded by Royer-Collard, Beugnot, Barante, Guizot, Villemain; they were very much afraid of his writing aggressive articles. Mme. de Rémusat came to Paris and discussed the question with M. Guizot; he reassured her, and said that they all intended to help the Government, that they would make no systematic opposition, that they would later find some Government office for Charles. Mme. de Rémusat was equally proud of her son, of his great successes at the age of twenty-two, and afraid of his impatience, of his imprudence. While she was in Paris her son was appointed Secretary of a Commission of Councillors of State, who had to prepare, under the presidency of the Minister of Justice, new laws on the jury. After this triumph she returned to Lille, and looked for some distraction in writing a book on the education of women (this book was published after her death by her husband in 1824, and a new edition is in preparation under the care of M. Gréard).

It must be confessed that these two new volumes of correspondence have not as much interest as the preceding ones. It is difficult for us to feel the same alarms as the Rémusats when they read at Lille their son's articles, written in Paris. He was in the fight, and they were in a quiet city of Flanders. As a prefect, Rémusat, the father, was, of course, completely dependent; and he could not help being afraid that the ministers might become angry with his son and accuse him of weakening the Administration. Passions ran very high in Paris. The doctrinaires found it difficult at times to support the Government; they were placed between two fires—between the ultras and the Liberals, who were becoming stronger every day, and who had allied themselves with the old Bonapartists. There is a curious account, in the sixth volume, of the assassination of the Duc de Berri at the Opéra, by Louvel, with all the details, and the echo of the emotions of the hour. Lally-Tollendal proposed to the Chamber of Peers an address which threw the responsibility of the crime of Louvel on the Liberal doctrines. In the Chamber of Deputies a deputy proposed that M. Decazes should be prosecuted. Decazes had to resign, and Chateaubriand had the cruelty to write in the Débats: "His feet slipped in the blood." Rémusat writes to his mother that the drawing-rooms had ceased to be tenable.

The crime of Louvel was the signal for a great reaction against constitutionalism and liberalism. Mme. de Rémusat was greatly agitated by these struggles; she liked Liberalism more than she liked the Liberals; she was afraid that her son might make mistakes. She was highly sensitive, delicate in politics as she was in everything. Her health had become altered, and she was obliged to leave Lille in the spring of 1820. After a while she became so ill that her husband had to leave Lille. Mme. de Rémusat took the most intense interest in the affairs of her country to the very end. Her son and her husband were the objects of her passionate affection, and she could not help feeling constantly afraid of their future. Her last days were marked by great agitation. A very short time afterwards, M. de Rémusat lost his place as prefect; the ordinance of M. de Villèle, which removed him from Lille, was signed on the 9th of January, 1822.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONSTITUTION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The recent course of political events seems to make it almost inevitable that the next Presidential contest will turn largely upon the question whether the President is right in his doctrine that "the Government should not support the people."

It is not to be presumed that a single veto has killed for ever a project so full of food for political harpies as the Dependent Pension Bill. That a similar measure will be passed by the next Congress may be taken for granted, as well as that it will again be vetoed. Considering the complexion of the Congress-elect, it may also be presumed that it will require hard work to prevent the passage of such a measure over the veto.

Is it not a fact that we are tasting now of the evils of seeking, by construction, a warrant in our Constitution for powers which its framers never intended it to grant? The Articles of Confederation were abandoned because they were a "rope of sand," and a substitute was adopted which, it was thought, would stand the strain with perfect safety; but, if your readers will pardon the figure, we have greased our new rope, thrown it over a precipice, and started on the descent. It is probably the intention of most people to stop at the end, but as the Supreme Court has carefully removed the knot which our worthy ropemakers tied there, the chances seem to be against an easy stoppage.

In all seriousness, could there be any greater or more necessary safeguard for popular institutions in the United States at present than a firm belief in and practice of the theory that our Constitution is to be taken just as its framers intended it to be taken? If we could depend upon our Supreme Court to block every appropriation of public money for which no positive warrant could be found in the Constitution, the various classes who are continually endeavoring to quarter themselves, in some way or other, upon the Treasury, would be compelled to turn their attention to the work of making a new Constitution. That, of course, would require the conversion to their theories of a good majority of the American people, pending which that part of the population which makes a point of attending strictly to its own business could enjoy a long life of comparative quiet and prosperity.

President Cleveland has brought out the fact that we need to get our feet upon solid ground again. His renomination, which is almost a certainty, will give us a good opportunity to show whether or not we are willing to do so. It is very possible that such a Republican as Sherman or Harrison would be too wise to retreat from the position to which Cleveland has gone forward in reforming the civil service. It is not possible that either one of the men named, or any other man at all likely to be mentioned for the nomination, could be depended upon to stand between the Treasury and such schemes of legalized plundering as the Blair Educational Bill and the Dependent Pension Bill.

Will the people be equal to the occasion?

ONE-MAN POWER.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The epitaph of the Forty-ninth Congress might be taken from the Liturgy of the Episcopal Church—"We have left undone those things which we ought to have done. We have done those things which we ought not to have done, and there is no health in us." It would lack, however, the quality of distinctiveness, as it would be just as applicable to any Congress since the war. Is there any hope that it will be less so to any future Congress? Or are we to go on year after year, while the will-o'-the-wisp leads us deeper and deeper into the bog? The papers discuss the conduct of a Democratic majority. It is fair to say that it is little if any better or worse than a Republican majority. The trouble is that Congress is itself a mob, equally distracted in its efforts and its failure to do anything.

One startling result of the session, however, is a fresh illustration of the way in which the necessity of leadership has developed into one-man power, but unaccompanied by one-man responsibility. Of late years the country has begun to perceive the immense and irresponsible power lodged in the hands of the Speaker, in theory an impartial presiding officer, but in practice a partisan leader. But a new phenomenon has appeared in the despotism of Mr. Randall, as Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Not that it is merely a personal achievement of Mr. Randall. The elaborate rules through which the House has struggled to get into working condition furnished the opportunity, and the man was sure to come, as others will be sure to follow him. The peculiarity of the situation is that, while the Speaker is responsible to a majority of the House (in fact a mere tool in their hands), the Chairman of Appropriations is responsible to no earthly authority but the voters of his district, who are much more likely to be gratified by seeing him rule the House, than troubled by his failure to use his power for the public benefit. His danger lies in the fierce competition of jealous rivals, whose object is to supplant rather than reform him.

Senator Hoar described the situation in a speech which called forth nothing but bitter acrimony; and in fact there are two or three considerations which make the effect almost worse than if he had said nothing. In the first place, it was done in the Senate, and of course the corporate spirit of the House will be up in arms at the interference of "the other body" with its affairs. Then Mr. Hoar represents only Massachusetts, and the other thirty-six States will be much more disposed to snub than to suppport him, as may be easily seen by glancing at the newspapers of other parts of the country. Lastly, the pugnacity of Mr. Randall's own constituents will be distinctly increased rather than diminished.

If there must be a leader or leaders, it seems obvious that they should be representative of the whole country. If the Secretary of the Treasury had been in the House during the session, a few questions from independent members might have drawn from him a statement similar, indeed, to that of Mr. Hoar, but having a very different aspect in the eyes of the country, and which, followed up, might lead to a fundamental reform of methods, and thereby of results, and thus make the history of the Fifty-ninth Congress a very different thing from that of the one just expired.

BALTIMORE "POLITICS."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The excellent article upon the rule of the criminal classes in Baltimore, which appeared in your issue of February 24, was aptly and pointedly illustrated on the day of its publication; for on that day the Mayor reappointed and the Council confirmed for the position of a Superintendent of Streets one James F. Busey, a notorious desperado of the Seventeenth Ward. The record of the arrests, indictments, and convictions of this man form an interesting and unique chapter in the criminal annals of our city. Busey is not without congenial company, but space would fail me to tell the names and achievements of the various worthies whom our Mayor (to use his own choice phraseology) has bidden to "seats at the Government table." TAXATION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your remarks in regard to the taxation of personal property suggest the following point. Holding a mortgage against property that will sell for $4,000, to nearly the amount of its value, the property is assessed $3,000 and the mortgage is assessed $3,000. The rate of taxation being nearly four per cent., the holder receives but two per cent. for the use of his money. In view of this fact, he forces settlement of the mortgage and obtains possession of the property, which he rents so favorably that he obtains over six per cent. on the investment after taxes and other expenses are met. The property now pays but one tax, the personal having been wiped out by cancellation of the mortgage. In accordance with the views of our legislative wiseacres, ought he not to be taxed for the privilege of receiving rent instead of interest?—Yours truly,

M. A. VEEDER.

WAS JEFFERSON DAVIS A REPUDIATOR?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In Mr. Roosevelt's 'Life of Benton' (p. 220) I notice the following statement:

"Before Jefferson Davis took his place among the arch-traitors in our annals, he had already been known as one of the chief repudiators."

As Mr. Davis was never a member of the Mississippi Legislature, I should be glad to know the authority for this assertion. B.

THE NEW SOUTH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: History repeats itself, and sometimes one of its repetitions is suggestive. In more than one of the barbarian kingdoms which were established on the ruins of the Roman Empire, when, after a reign of lawless violence, some king had put it down with a strong hand, the resulting security would be described by saying, "A man with his bosom full of gold might pass in safety from one end of the kingdom to the other," or by some similar statement—a kind of barbarian description of barbarian security.

A few days ago the city where I live was honored by a visit from one of the members of a "celebrated" family which has maintained in a neighboring county a partial reign of terror for nearly a generation, in carrying on a bloody feud with another celebrated family. An enterprising daily sent a reporter to interview the gentleman, and his "views" are interesting. After denouncing in vigorous language those who report that human life is not respected in his community, he proves that perfect good order exists there by saying, "A man may ride over our country with an armload of greenbacks, and a thousand chances to one he will never be hurt."

Verily this is progress—a first step, you see, out of the condition which you have so often been pleased to call barbarism. Congratulate us, please. PRESTON.

THE DEGREE OF A.B.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apart from the question whether the B.A. degree should stand for any kind of college training, or for instruction in the ancient classics together with other subjects, there is not so much danger of its deterioration by the "academies with degree-giving powers" as some persons imagine. The fact of the matter is, that many of the instructors in such institutions are graduates of real colleges; and, holding the genuine degree themselves, they practically withhold it from their students who for one reason or another are unfit for the honor. This is done by establishing a curriculum leading to the degree of B.A., somewhere near the standard of the older colleges, but beyond the ability of most of the students to reach. Then easier courses are laid out leading to the comparatively unimportant degrees of Ph.B., B.S., and B.L., and in these most of the students are graduated. I do not say that this is the rule with all or even a majority of such colleges; but that the number of candidates for the inferior degrees exceeds the number who are to receive the degree of B.A. in many minor institutions, any doubter can see by consulting the last report of the Commissioner of Education.

Again, it is worth considering that the weaker institutions generally have a local patronage, and their graduates do not often come in contact with those of the same generation whose degrees are of the first quality, so to speak; there being no comparison, the evil is not great to the country at large. Still, one is inclined to wish that the general Government could in some way be given a censorship over degree-conferring institutions, so that the same title would have an approximate value all over the country. But as the Government has not such power, certainly the States ought to look to the matter. W. A. M.

PLASTOUNOFF AS AN EMBRYOLOGIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I received to-day the enclosed letter from our enterprising Russian, in which he poses as an embryologist:

"MOST REVEREND SIR: If it is permitted for a stranger like me, may I ask as a great favour that you will be good enough as to send me kindly a copy of your work, 'Zoology for students and general reader.' In return it will give me great pleasure to send you a copy of my work on Embryology, if you are acquainted with Russian language. I remain, sir, yours most respectfully, ROMAN PLASTOUNOFF.

"KIEW, 19 Febr., 1887."

The works of the Russian embryologists are well known to American students, especially those connected with the University of Kiew; we need scarcely add that Plastounoff's name does not appear among them.

Yours respectfully, A. S. PACKARD.

PROVIDENCE, March 7, 1887.

Notes.

THE CENTURY CO. are about to publish the Rev. C. S. Robinson's course of lectures, during the present winter, on Egypt, under the title, 'The Pharaohs of the Bondage and the Exodus,' in the light of the latest discoveries among the royal tombs.

Recent discoveries in the East are also the basis of 'Echoes of Bible History,' by the Rt. Rev. W. P. Walsh, Bishop of Ossory, Ireland, in the press of Thomas Whittaker.

'The Theology of Evolution,' a lecture by Prof. E. D. Cope, will shortly be published by Arnold & Co., Philadelphia.

Ticknor & Co.'s spring announcements include 'American Literature and Other Papers,' by the late Edwin P. Whipple, with an introduction by J. G. Whittier; 'Last Memorials of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow,' by his brother; 'Due North,' a book of European travel, by Maturin M. Ballou; 'Day Dreams and Musings,' by Mrs. S. G. W. Benjamin; 'Lights and Shadows of a Life,' by Madeleine Vinton Dahlgren; and the following novels: 'Two Gentlemen of Boston'; 'The Strike in the B—— Mills'; 'The Confessions of Claud,' by Edgar Fawcett; 'The Devil's Bat,' by Melville Philips. In May the same firm will begin a weekly issue, for three months, of paper-covered volumes for summer reading, embracing "some of the choicest and most successful novels of late years," with some brand-new ones. Still later they will bring out 'The New Astronomy,' by S. P. Langley, illustrated; 'Stories and Sketches,' by John Boyle O'Reilly; 'Safe Building,' by Louis De Coppet Berg; a new and enlarged Concordance to the Bible, by the Rev. J. B. R. Walker; and 'Steadfast,' a novel, by Rose Terry Cooke.

Scribner & Welford will be the American publishers of Robert Buchanan's 'A Look Round Literature.' They will also issue a new edition of Fleming's 'Vocabulary of Philosophy.'

Chas. Scribner's Sons will add 'The Early Tudors' to the "Epochs of Modern History" series.

The text of the "Adelphi" of Terence, with stage directions, by Henry Preble, instructor in Latin at Harvard College, will be published on April 1, by Ginn & Co.

Mr. Edmund Gosse has been preparing a course of lectures on the English critics under Queen Anne—an interesting subject, although even the best of them, John Dennis, is now as dead as Queen Anne herself. After being delivered before the Royal Institute in London, they will appear as a book.

Among recent English announcements is the "Mermaid Series," to contain the best plays of the old dramatists, unexpurgated. It will be edited by Havelock Ellis, with a general introduction by J. A. Symonds. There will be about five plays in every volume, besides a preface by an expert. Mr. Ellis begins with a volume of Marlowe, and will edit later a volume of Ford. Mr. Swinburne has written an introduction for the selection from Middleton, and Mr. Gosse will edit the selection from Shirley. Mr. Symonds prepares the volumes from Webster, Cyril Tourneur, and Heywood. The series is intended to include not only the chief dramatists of the Elizabethan period, but those also of the Restoration. The Hon. Roden Noel will edit Otway, and volumes of Dryden, Lee, and Congreve are also announced.

In the monthly volumes of the "Canterbury Poets," edited by William Sharp, twenty-seven poets have now appeared, including five Americans—Longfellow, Whittier, Poe, Emerson, and Whitman. In the corresponding prose series, the "Camelot Classics," edited by Ernest Rhys, thirteen numbers have appeared, of which three are of American authorship—Thoreau's 'Walden,' Lowell's 'My Study Windows,' and the prose writings of Longfellow.

The latest American addition to the Tauchnitz series is Miss Alcott's 'Jo's Boys.'

Mr. A. W. A'Beckett has revised and enlarged his father's famous 'Comic Blackstone,' and it is now appearing in monthly parts with illustrations by Mr. Harry Furniss (London: Bradbury, Agnew & Co.; New York: Scribner & Welford).

Mr. Samuel Arthur Bent's 'Familiar Short Sayings of Great Men' (Ticknor & Co.) has taken to itself the prefix "Familiar" since it first appeared in 1882. It now presents itself in a fifth edition—proof that its solid merits have been appreciated. A very considerable extension has been given to it, sometimes in the way of additions, as in the case of Chatham, whose "atrocious crime of being a young man" is at last recorded; sometimes by wholly new insertions, as in the case of Emerson. The recent Carlyle literature has enabled Mr. Bent to represent this writer much more freely than heretofore, and there is given a very convenient list of judgments on his contemporaries, with a large American contingent—Sumner, Judge Hoar, Margaret Fuller, Dr. Hedge, Washington. In accordance with his method, Mr. Bent passes from Carlyle's estimate of Judge Hoar to some of the latter's views of his contemporaries, like the savage one on Wendell Phillips. The Lincolniana are multiplied, and President Cleveland opens a wholly new chapter with "Public office is a public trust," "Offensive partisanship," etc., in the course of which we have the etymology and the political origin of "mugwump," and hear Flanagan of Texas asking, "What are we here for ?" Even "Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion" is not omitted. The devil's insufficient title to all the good times is taken from Wesley and assigned to the Rev. Rowland Hill. Webster, in reply to Hayne, referred to the doctrine that a national debt is a national blessing. We are reminded that it was Sam Patch who first said: "Some things can be done as well as others." A special index has been made for the addenda to this useful work.

'Bedside Poetry: A Parent's Assistant in Moral Discipline' (Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.) aims to furnish a convenient collection of verse chosen with reference to its moral bearings, but also with a view to elevating the literary taste of the children to whom it may be read. To facilitate its application to daily conduct, a so-called Key to the moralities enforced by the poems is furnished in dictionary fashion. The poets found available are comparatively few in number, and our American anthology contributes its full share.

Knowles's "Hunchback" and "Love-Chase," Peacock's 'Crotchet Castle,' more of Plutarch's Lives—Pericles, Fabius Maximus, Demosthenes, and Cicero—and Macaulay's 'Lays of Ancient Rome,' are the latest issues in "Cassell's National Library."

The Clarendon Press, Oxford (New York: Macmillan), publishes in pleasing form 'Thirteen Satires of Juvenal,' edited with introduction and notes by C. H. Pearson and Herbert A. Strong. The introduction comprises five parts, beginning with an admirable sketch of Juvenal's life by Mr. Pearson, who seeks with scholarly care and acumen to sift the truth from the various manuscript biographies of Juvenal, and discusses Juvenal's character and place in literature. On pages 36 and 37, Mr. Pearson observes, with well-concealed humor, that Juvenal was a Puritan, that his wit is American and is comparable with Mr. Lowell's. The second part of the introduction tabulates briefly the conclusions arrived at by Prof. Nettleship in a lecture on the correspondence between the epigrams of Martial and the satires of Juvenal. The third, fourth, and fifth parts treat respectively of the chief codices of Juvenal, the social condition of Rome under the early Empire, and the Roman satura. Jahn's text is adopted in the main; but use is made of Beer's collation of the codex Pithœanus described in his 'Spicilegium Juvenalianum' (Leipzig, 1882). This edition is designed for schools and universities, and is admirably adapted to its purpose. The notes are scholarly and are very full, as they must needs be. Although the editors say that they have expurgated the text so that it may safely be perused by mixed classes, they have fallen far short of prudery in their eliminations, and have left not a few lines, as e. g., i. 77 and 78, iii. 65, x. 220, xi. 186 and 187, xiv. 25-29, which modest young men and women could not wish to read together.

M. Abraham Dreyfus, one of the brightest of the younger French dramatists of our day, has gathered into one volume 'Jouons la Comédie' (Paris: Lévy; New York: F. W. Christern), seven little one-act comedies, all of which are quite decorous according to the French code, and most of which are perfectly proper even in the eyes of an American young girl. We may single out for special praise "La Victime," "Une Rupture," and "Le Klephte"—this last being a most ingenious variation of the theme treated more coarsely in the little German play "Eigensinn."

Les Archives Théâtrales is the title of a new monthly record of music and the drama in Paris. It is edited by M. Paul Meyan, and published by MM. Tresse & Stock (New York: F. W. Christern), and will appear as a thirty-six-page pamphlet on the tenth of every month, the final issue of the year containing the index, etc. The 'Erc Almanack' for 1887 contains the record of the English stage for 1886. Its chief attraction is a series of facsimiles of autograph letters of leading actors and actresses in answer to the query: "What is the most striking incident of your professional experience ?" This is a variety of the "symposium" not yet attempted in America. The record of the American stage of last year is to be found in the 'Clipper Almanac'—side by side with the record of other things more materialistic.

M. le vicomte d'Avenel has detached from the volumes in preparation of his 'Richelieu et la Monarchie absolue'—two having already been published (Paris: Plon, 1884)—several very interesting chapters for the Revue Historique. In these he shows the state of the French clergy in the first half of the seventeenth century. With great impartiality he depicts the numerous abuses that had gradually crept into the French Church, most of these being abuses really introduced by the State, against which pious ecclesiastics struggled in vain. The injurious effects of the union of Church and State as it existed until the Revolution of 1789 are clearly shown by M. d'Avenel, who in many cases makes use of unpublished historical documents with such skill that the dry and often petty facts with which he has to deal become revelations, throwing a flood of light upon a very obscure corner of history.

There are many questions connected with the life of Columbus which are still veiled in obscurity, and concerning which there is great variance of opinion. A new contribution to the literature of the subject lies before us. It is entitled 'Acten zu Columbus' Geschichte von 1473 bis 1492: eine kritische Studie, von Max Büdinger,' a reprint from the proceedings of the Austrian Imperial Academy of Sciences ('Sitzungsberichte der phil.-hist. Classe, CXII. Bd., II. Heft,' 1886). "I venture," says the author, "to appear among the combatants partly to present some new materials which hitherto have not been used, or have been inadequately exploited, partly to attempt a settlement of the very divergent opinions, now prevailing, by looking at the questions in dispute from a new point of view." Dr. Büdinger divides his matter into three parts: (1.) The "Historie," or life of Columbus written by the latter's son Ferdinand; (2.) His service under King René; (3.) His arrival in Portugal and departure from that country. The various opinions of Harrisse, D'Avezac, Peragallo, and others concerning the above subjects are amply stated and criticised. All interested in these questions will find Büdinger's monograph useful, although he definitively settles very few of the points at issue, and presents fewer new materials than one would anticipate from the title and preamble of the work.

We regret the necessity which puts the Bancroft Historical Library upon the market, but we can only regard its proposed purchase by the State of California as eminently proper. There ought to be no difficulty in reaching a just valuation of this invaluable collection.

The double number which ushers in the twelfth volume of the Library Journal is an earnest of its conductors' intention to make it simply irresistible to the profession (let us add, to any owner of a more than ordinary private library) during the current year. Its main feature is furnished in advance by the Bureau of Education, and is a detailed list of all the public libraries in the United States having 1,000 volumes and upwards. They number 2,981, or one to every 10,000 of the population, with an average of 3,862 volumes. New Hampshire has one library to every 2,700 inhabitants; Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, one to every 3,000-3,500. Massachusetts is in the van as regards the number of libraries—427, or rather more than fourteen per cent. of the grand total. New York is close behind with 391, but of course with a marked disproportion when population is considered. The respective volume totals are: Massachusetts, 3,569,085; New York, 3,168,508 A careful count shows that (exclusive of suburbs) New York city's libraries have 1,414,795 volumes; those of Boston 1,015,419. Forty-seven libraries have 50,000 and upwards; the Library of Congress standing first (with 565,134 volumes), and the Boston Public second (434,837). Among these no Southern State, except Maryland and Missouri, is represented, while more than one-sixth are in Massachusetts and nearly one-quarter in New England. Other statistical tables are those relating to the Copyright Office. Here what strikes one as curious is the slight increase in copyright deposits in the years 1883-86 (counting each deposit as one work), viz., 18,330, 17,175, 19,490, 22,719, 22,805, 24,430, 24,032. There is much good reading that we cannot specify. The quarterly Coöperative Index to Periodicals published in connection with the Library Journal now completes its second volume.

The Studio for February has some very just remarks on Mr. Walter Shirlaw's designs for Goldsmith's ballad, "The Hermit," one of which, by permission, it contrasts with the corresponding design by Flaxman. There are several other illustrations—an etching of a ewer, laudable of its kind if not first-rate; and two process reproductions, viz., of the well-known 1508 medal by Dürer, in very low relief, and of an Italian portrait already copied in the Studio, but less effectively.

We find in the Paris Temps of February 12 a short account of a very ingenious and valuable contrivance, the autographomètre, invented by M. Floran de Villepigne, an engineer connected with the Panama Canal. This vehicle (petit chariot), drawn along the thoroughfares of a city, registers as it goes the distance traversed, the grade of the streets, and the angles of their intersection.

In the Acta Mathematica, a journal published at Stockholm since 1882, under the direction of Prof. G. Mittag-Leffler, assisted by the foremost mathematicians of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Finland, and which has now reached the ninth volume, the sole contribution in the English language is from the pen of an American writer, Mr. G. W. Hill of the Nautical Almanac Office, Washington, and relates to that part of the motion of the perigree of the moon's orbit which is a function of the mean motion of the sun and moon. Mr. Hill is announced as the recipient this year of the Royal Astronomical Society's gold medal for his important contributions to mathematical astronomy.

—The Century for March has a page or two of that very rare thing, noble imaginative writing, in a half-dozen prose-poems by Emma Lazarus, upon the fate of the Jews. Though expressed in English, they are truly Oriental in character, but with a humanitarianism and a feeling for America as a harbor of refuge, which give a peculiar strangeness to the ancient Scriptural form into which they are run. No current poetry has touched the level of "The Sower" in vigor of imagination, or of the sudden turn at the conclusion of "The Exodus" and "The Test" in power of style, for a long time. Some lines by Joel Benton on "Dakotah" are also exceptionally excellent. Mr. Stillman contributes a beautifully illustrated article upon Greek coinage, and in the course of his interesting remarks upon the subject one observes the striking declaration of opinion—"With an admiration of the severe and intellectual art of Phidias second to none, I am heretic enough to admit that of the full circle of art Scopas and Praxiteles had more than Phidias, just as Titian had more than Gian-Bellini." It is the old case of expression vs. conception, but in this application it has the material for a very "pretty" argument. He states in a note that his theory that the Venus of Melos is a "Victory" has been "accepted by many students of ancient art as sufficiently established for acceptance as the most probable attribution," and adds some slight new confirmations. Prof. Tillett's enthusiastic article upon "The White Man of the New South" should find many readers, and his hopes for the literature of the South will be cordially seconded; the development of the press is certainly a cardinal sign in that field. "Composite Photography" is the subject of an article of both technical and popular interest, and there is an excellent, kindly, and much-needed paper of reminiscences of Secretary Stanton.

—The fifth number of the publications of the American Economic Association, like the fourth, is devoted to the subject of coöperation. The field covered in this instance is the New England States. The author, Prof. E. W. Bemis, has evidently taken very great pains with his investigation, and states his results with great clearness, although, we apprehend, at somewhat too great length for any but students of the subject. Probably most persons would be surprised to learn of the early date at which coöperative enterprises made their appearance in New England. Their number, too, has been surprisingly large, although comparatively few have been successful. The coöperative stores, or societies for distribution, seem to prosper as a rule only when organized upon the Rochdale plan. But in these enterprises, as in all business, everything depends upon the managers: where they are unskilful or underpaid, the weaknesses of human nature very soon bring about financial ruin. Mr. Bemis is able to establish one generalization of great practical value: where the expenses of doing business are kept below eight per cent. of the amount of the sales, a coöperative store has a good chance of success; if they exceed this limit, disaster is nearly certain. Those who contemplate the formation of societies of this kind, therefore, are furnished with a well-established basis for their calculations. The co-operative banks, or building and loan associations, of New England, are computed to have assets amounting to $3,500,000; the capital of the fifty-three coöperative stores from which reports were obtained was about $140,000, which is "turned over" twelve or thirteen times a year; that of the companies engaged in productive coöperation amounted to about $300,000. But the moral effects of these associations are not to be measured by the magnitude of their financial transactions.

—Appendix V of the Tenth Report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission has just appeared. It is wholly devoted to Ireland, containing reports by John T. Gilbert on the MSS. of the Marquis of Ormonde, the Earl of Fingall, the Sees of Dublin and Ossory, the Order of Jesuits, and the towns of Waterford and Galway. The report on the first-mentioned collection consists of a "Calendar of petitions, A. D. 1666-1669, addressed to James, Duke of Ormonde, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and to his Deputy, Thomas Earl of Ossory." These petitions throw much light upon the general and social history of Ireland during that period. Mr. Gilbert gives copious extracts from this as well as from all the other collections. The principal MS. belonging to the Earl of Fingall is entitled "A Light to the Blind; whereby they may see the dethronement of James the Second, King of England, with a brief narrative of his warr in Ireland, and of the warr between the Emperor and the King of France for the Crown of Spain—Anno 1711." The partisan bias of this interesting work may be gathered from the following brief extract:

"The nature of King James the Second was farr different from that of Queen Elizabeth. He was a lamb, she a tyger. He compelled noe Protestant by fine, imprisonement, forfeiture of estate, or by death to turn Roman Catholick. She by all the said means tyranically constrained the Catholicks to embrace her phrenzy, and swear her to be (O profane woman!) Vicar of the Saviour of the world in the government of the Church of England. . . . In fine, this Jezabel with bloody force (as Mahomet extirpated the Christians of Asia) so she destroyed the Catholick religion of England (which had been there planted in the 7th age of Christianity in various miracles), after she had made an end of all the ould Bishops of the land in prison and exile, and murdered the inferiour clergy, and banished them; giving all the ecclesiastick liveings of the kingdom to mock-Bishops of her own, and to her ministers" (pp. 116-117).

The oldest record connected with the See of Dublin is the "Crede Mihi," the surviving portion of a register book of documents, chiefly relating to that See and ranging in date from 1178 to the latter part of the thirteenth century. Mr. Gilbert gives a calendar of its contents on pages 206-219. This is followed on pages 222-265 by excerpts from the "Red Book of the Diocese of Ossory." The documents in the archives of the Jesuits, extending from 1576 to 1698, consist of original letters and other papers, most of the former being addressed to the Generals of the Order. Mr. Gilbert has forgotten to name the place where these records are deposited. The reports on the civic muniments of Waterford and Galway (pp. 265-339, 380-520) constitute a valuable contribution to the study of municipal history, and are models of admirable editing. Those employed by the Commission to report on the municipal archives of England will do well to study Mr. Gilbert's method. This volume will add much to the good reputation which the Commission already enjoys. Every specialist in the domain of English, Irish, and Scotch history, and all who are interested in the advancement of historical learning, must feel under obligations to the Commission which is making such valuable treasures accessible to the public.

—One of the recent additions to Bohn's "Standard Library" (New York: Scribner & Welford) consists of a selection from the correspondence of Goethe with Zelter, edited and translated by A. D. Coleridge. The original correspondence appeared in 1833-34, in six volumes containing, in the aggregate, 855 letters. Of these Mr. Coleridge's volume gives us, wholly or in part, 382 numbers. The translator informs us that his first intention was to present the letters of Goethe in their entirety, with such extracts from those of Zelter as might be necessary in order to render the others intelligible. This plan, which would have necessitated two volumes, was given up; only a selection is offered from the letters of Goethe, these being often abridged, and not a little of Zelter is given apparently for its own sake. Whether the volume as it lies before us is worth the making, is a question which we should antecedently be disposed to answer in the negative. Zelter, it may not be wholly superfluous to say, was born in 1758, and became by trade a stone-mason. He found time, however, to educate himself in letters, and especially in music, and, aside from his friendship with Goethe, his best title to remembrance is that he was the teacher of Felix Mendelssohn, and the "restorer" of Sebastian Bach. His acquaintance with Goethe began in 1799. A warm and intimate friendship, based upon a community of ideal interests, sprang up between them, and found expression in a correspondence which continued without long intermissions until the death of Goethe in March, 1832. This correspondence has always been accounted a valuable source of biographical information, although it reveals but little concerning the higher aspects of Goethe's intellectual life. It is, in fact, in the main, a quotidian chronicle of small beer which is only now and then lighted up with a stray glint of humor or a wise reflection such as one likes to store away in his memory. The daily occupation of the two correspondents, the doings of mutual friends, musical and theatrical interests, literary gossip—these are the staple themes of the original six volumes and of Mr. Coleridge's one volume. Few people in these days, we should imagine, would care to read this correspondence at all for purposes of literary edification, while all who might have occasion to use it as a source of biographical information will be able to read, and will naturally prefer, the original. At least so it would appear to us.

—Mr. Coleridge says, however, apparently by way of forestalling such criticism: "Any new light thrown upon Goethe's genius and character should be welcome to the student of German literature. The recent production of the Jahrbuch, and the affiliation of the English Goethe Society to the Weimar Goethe-Gesellschaft, have so stimulated the interest of readers in the publication of new matter affecting Goethe, that it is to be hoped the present volume may be opportune rather than otherwise." We sincerely hope that Mr. Coleridge does not misjudge his public. He has at any rate, so far as our comparisons have gone, done his own work well, and given us in good idiomatic English a large amount of matter, which does, in truth, throw some light upon Goethe's "genius and character," and a great deal more upon his daily walk and conversation during the last three decades of his life. Even the "small beer" will doubtless have its uses. There are those for whom Goethe in his later years is only a Sage throned in cærulean mists of speculation, and feeding from day to day upon sublime abstractions concerning Man, Nature, Art, and Science. To all such it will be salutary to look over the shoulders of their hero, so to speak, and watch him as he writes to his friend in Berlin: "Turnips and fish have arrived safely, the former beautifully dry, and the latter well frozen." . . . "The turnips are all the more welcome as there are no chestnuts on the Rhine or Main this year. So we do not eat them as a separate dish, but, served up with cabbage, they are very effective."

—The Revue Internationale, in its issue of January 10 (Christern), began the publication of an extremely valuable literary curiosity, the journal intime of Benjamin Constant. This entirely unintentional contribution to the literary history of the beginning of the century has been preserved among the private papers of the family of Constant de Rébecque, and it is to one of the descendants of the family, the Countess of Pückler-Branitz, that the present publication is due. At some time not stated, her father, M. Adrien Constant de Rébecque, seems to have made the selections now published, and to have written the short but excellent account of his famous relative which is given as an introduction. The journal itself begins at Weimar in 1804, when the writer's ten years of exile from France had just begun. His amie and companion in exile, Mme. de Staël, whose chains had already become very heavy for Constant, was then living near Leipzig. Here and elsewhere in Germany he made her flying visits, but the extracts at this period are generally at times when he was alone, and could give himself up to the delights of an intellectual life and the society of the great writers of the period, with whom he was in familiar contact. The names of Goethe, Schiller, Wieland, and later Schlegel and Sismondi, constantly recur, often accompanied by a judgment or an appreciation in which the most acute observation and insight are shown. No less clear-sighted and subtile are Constant's observations upon the authors whom he encounters only in his reading. Those upon Herder and Schelling are especially interesting, and also all his impressions of the "new philosophy" of Germany. The notes are generally very short, and they are written with the utmost simplicity and frankness. Very seldom is there anything that can be made to seem like posing, even for himself. A very clear and positive vision of Benjamin Constant disengages itself from these fragments of his journal, and an almost equally clear one of Mme. de Staël at this period of her life.

—La fièvre verte, in allusion to the green palms on the official academic costume, is an expression sometimes used to designate the intense desire that comes over French men of letters to be ranked among the "Forty Immortals." As all cannot be chosen, many have been the storms in the Academy when men representative of new ideas and tendencies have sought to be admitted. The history of these struggles may be read in the just published volume of M. Albert Rouxel, 'Chroniques des Élections à l'Académie Française' (Paris: Didot; Boston: Schoenhof). Unfortunately, it does not go beyond 1841, when Victor Hugo finally gained admittance, succeeding one of his bitterest enemies, Lemercier. Generally, however, whatever animosity the public at large might feel towards the candidates before their election, subsided when the Academy had decided upon its choice. In regard to the last two elections, this has not been the case. The choice of M. Hervé did not meet the approval of the Republicans generally; the choice of M. Gréard has not been taken kindly by the Monarchists. M. Hervé is a well-known and influential publicist, who, especially since he founded the journal Le Soleil in 1873, has devoted himself to the fusion of the Orleanists and the Legitimists. Since the death of the Comte de Chambord, he has been urging the Orleans princes to action. It is no wonder, then, that, in the present state of feeling towards the exiled princes, the choice of the Academy should not have been well received. The most radical even called for the immediate suppression of the august body, "the only monarchy that remains standing in France."

—With M. Gréard the case is different. He would here in no sense be looked upon as a political character. He has devoted his life to education. No man has done more for the development of primary instruction in France. His various reports on this subject are admirable documents of high literary merit. But the laicisation of schools is a burning question in France, and M. Gréard has incurred the ill-will of all who do not wish to see the education of the young in the hands of the laity. Great, therefore, was the outcry of the clerical and royalist press when he was chosen to succeed M. de Falloux, a catholique libéral. Why, say his opponents, not have chosen M. d'Haussonville, the son of an academician who died but recently, the grandnephew of another academician, the nephew of another still living, and the great-grandson of Mme. de Staël? Why choose M. Gréard, the "prompter of the school laws of the Republic." And then names, not over-courteous, are lavished on the new member elect. He is a universitaire, a pedagogue, his works are those of un professeur de rhétorique. Thus, while the revolutionists demand the suspension of the Academy because it is too monarchical, the monarchists and conservatives do not think it in harmony with the spirit of the day. Meanwhile, M. Gréard answers, in the only way becoming the new honor conferred upon him, by publishing a book which shows him to be worthy of it: 'L'Éducation des femmes par les femmes' (Paris: Hachette; Boston: Schoenhof). This is the first volume of a series of "Études et Portraits." It treats of Fénelon, J.-J. Rousseau, Mme. de Maintenon, Mme. de Lambert, Mme. d'Épinay, Mme. Necker, Mme. Roland, with a preface on Mme. de Sévigné. The author announces a second series as in preparation, reaching down to modern times.

GIUSEPPE VERDI.

Verdi: an Anecdotic History of his Life and Works. By Arthur Pougin. Scribner & Welford. 1887. Pp. 308.

THIS translation, by Mr. James E. Matthew, of the most complete biography of Verdi in existence, appears opportunely at a time when the musical world is busy talking about Verdi's latest and probably last work, "Otello." It cannot be said that it is anything more than what it purports to be—an anecdotic record of the composer's twenty-six ("Otello" not included) operatic productions in the order of their appearance, with details regarding their reception and the principal singers who took part in the first or otherwise notable performances. Inasmuch as of these twenty-seven operas only about half-a-dozen have ever had any vogue outside of Italy, some of these details are necessarily of little interest; yet the author wisely reserves most of his space for the best-known of Verdi's operas, and, moreover, gives a large number of new and entertaining biographic details, especially regarding the composer's youth. The reader who desires a critical estimate of Verdi's operas will find much more material in the forty pages which Dr. Hanslick devotes to them in his 'Moderne Oper' than in M. Pougin's 300 pages. It is perhaps fortunate that the latter abstains from criticism, for there are intimations that he would not disagree with a writer in the Revue des Deux Mondes, who spoke of Verdi as "the foremost, or, we may almost say, the only dramatic, artist of our time."

In his first chapter M. Pougin reproduces a facsimile autograph of the certificate of Verdi's birth, extracted from the registers of the état civil of the commune of Busseto, which shows that Verdi was born in the same year as Wagner —1813—and not 1814, as is often stated. But in 1814 Verdi, as his biographer remarks, a second time owed his life to his mother. The Russians having invaded the village Le Roncole, she took refuge with others in the church. The soldiers, however, broke in, and a scene of carnage ensued. But Signora Verdi succeeded in hiding in the belfry with her little Giuseppe until the danger was over—an incident which one rather wonders that the composer of "Rigoletto" did not find a congenial subject for an operatic text. The boy received his first musical impressions from a poor wandering musician, whose "wretched violin charmed the little Verdi till he nearly fell into ecstasy," and who is supposed to have been the first to advise Verdi's father to let him study music. At the age of eight he managed to secure an old spinet which a tradesman repaired for his benefit, and the organist of the village church was his first teacher. In three years he had made so much progress that his father sent him to the neighboring town of Busseto, where he boarded with a cobbler for thirty centimes or six cents a day. Every Sunday he went on foot to Le Roncole to perform his duties as organist, for which he received the princely sum of $20 a year. On one of these expeditions he fell into a ditch on a dark night, and would probably have been drowned had not a peasant woman heard his cries and saved him.

To the world at large, Verdi is known exclusively as a composer of operas—including a quasi-operatic requiem. But his operatic career was preceded by a period of miscellaneous composition, as is shown in this citation from the Gazzetta Musicale of Milan:

"From the age of thirteen to that of eighteen, the period at which Verdi came to Milan to study counterpoint, he wrote a heap of compositions of all kinds: marches for band up to a round hundred; perhaps as many short symphonic pieces, which served for the church, for the theatre, or for the concert room; five or six concertos or airs with variations for the pianoforte, which he performed himself at concerts; many serenades, cantatas, airs, a vast number of duets, trios, and various works for the church, among which is a 'Stabat Mater.'"

Some of these pieces were utilized in his earliest operas; and subsequently, too, after the fashion of the time, Verdi did not hesitate to transfer to a new opera the best melodies of an earlier one that had failed. Nor is there any reason for objecting to such a proceeding in the case of Italian melodies, which rarely have any dramatic individuality or local color. If, on the other hand, we reflect on the incongruity of transferring, e. g., the Flying Dutchman motive, or the swan motive in "Lohengrin," or the magic-fire music in the "Walküre," to another opera, we realize most vividly one cause of the superiority of the German music drama over Italian opera.

Many of the early compositions just enumerated were written for the Philharmonic Society of Busseto, at whose concerts Verdi at first played the drum, though subsequently advanced to the posts of pianist and conductor. Nevertheless, when he presented himself for examination at the Milan Conservatory, he was rejected—a fact attested by one of his own letters. But if his musical accomplishments failed to make any impression on the hard-hearted Conservatory professors, they served him a better turn in the case of the tender-hearted daughter of a friend and benefactor of his. He used to play four-hand pieces with this girl, and, as usual in such cases, engagement and marriage followed. Their happiness was of only a few years' duration. "In the space of about two months," he writes in a letter, "three loved ones had disappeared for ever. I had no longer a family. And, in the midst of this terrible anguish, to avoid breaking the engagement I had contracted, I was compelled to write and finish a comic opera." No wonder that this opera, "Un Giorno di Regno," failed. It was his second opera, the first having been "Oberto," on which his profits were $350. His next opera, "Nabuco," was a success—so much so that Verdi was asked to write the opera d'obbligo for the next carnival season, and to make his own terms. He asked for the same sum that Bellini had obtained for "Norma"—about $1,350. From this date the history of Verdi, so far as known, is little more than the history of his operas. These had the most diverse fortunes, some being successful everywhere, some only in Italy, and not a few of them failures even there. "Rigoletto," "La Traviata," and "Il Trovatore," however, had put his reputation on a firm basis for the time, and when, in 1869, the Khedive of Egypt asked him to write an opera for his new theatre in Cairo, the sum demanded—$20,000—was paid without a murmur. The copyright and other profits on his latest opera, "Otello," are said to amount already to almost twice that sum.

As Verdi's fame increased, his patriotic countrymen made numerous efforts to lionize him, but he never cared to be "trotted about" as a curiosity, having been averse all his life to posing as a genius. Even the offers of conducting one of his works in some new "Teatro Verdi" could not induce him to make an exception. To one such invitation he replied: "Everything opposes it—my age, my health, and, still more than everything else, my inclination. Just tell me, Mr. President, what should I do there? Show myself? Seek applause? That cannot be." Nor did offers of political honors tempt him. When Cavour wanted to unite in his first national Parliament all the men who had distinguished themselves in Italy, he begged Verdi to accept a seat in the Chamber of Deputies. Verdi refused at first, saying that he hated to find himself prominent, and wanted nothing but to be allowed to work quietly in retirement. Finally he consented to appear in the Chamber, but three months later he sent in his resignation. In 1875 Victor Emanuel appointed him a senator. He took the oath, yet, so far as M. Pougin is aware, has never taken his seat.

With all this retiring modesty, Verdi has always known how to preserve his dignity and insist on his rights as a composer. A few instances will illustrate this. During the rehearsals of "Ernani," the prima donna insisted on having the score end with a rondo in which she could display her powers of vocalization. Such a demand was nothing unusual in the palmy days of Italian opera, when the composers were the slaves of the singers, and had constantly to sacrifice their artistic conscience to the vanity and whims of famous vocalists. The librettist in this case was willing to accede to the prima donna's wishes, but Verdi "went off in one of those fits of artistic wrath which the poet had long been accustomed to submit to with great philosophy. 'Do you wish,' said he, 'to ruin the finest situation in the work?'" And he firmly refused to do it. On another occasion, when his "Vêpres Siciliennes" was brought out at Paris, Manager Perrin begged Verdi to conduct some performances. Verdi consented, but insisted on having an orchestral rehearsal. The members of the orchestra, however, appeared in a sullen humor, playing at first much too fast, and, after being remonstrated with, dragging the tempo in an extravagant manner. "It is a poor joke, no doubt," Verdi remarked to the chef d'orchestre, Dietsch. "The fact is, Maestro," replied Dietsch, "these gentlemen think that they have no need to rehearse." "Really?" "Yes; they have their own private business." "Ah, they have their own business, which is not that of the Opéra. That makes a difference." With this he seized his hat, left the house, and did not enter it again, although he had his revenge, for Dietsch was discharged three days later. When in 1873 the manager of the Opéra applied for permission to produce "Aïda," Verdi wrote: "I have been so little satisfied each time that I have had to do with your great theatre, that I am not disposed to risk a new attempt. . . . I have not the courage to face again all the trickery and opposition which rule in that theatre, of which I have preserved a painful recollection."

Considering the obscure and uninviting character of most of Verdi's librettis, one is rather surprised to read that he took great pains personally in having everything to suit himself. Concerning one of his librettists, who prepared eight of his texts, M. Pougin writes: "A tolerably bad poet, quite wanting in invention, Piave was not without a certain skill as librettist, and he had, from Verdi's point of view, the overwhelming quality of effacing himself completely, of putting aside every kind of personal vanity, and of following entirely the indications and the desires of the composer, cutting out this, paring down that, shortening or expanding at the will of the latter—giving himself up, in short, to all his exigencies, whatever they might be." In some cases the censors made sad havoc of his librettis. In another place M. Pougin informs us that Verdi not only always chooses the subject of his operas, but, in addition to that, "he draws out the sketch of the libretti, indicates all the situations, constructs them almost entirely as far as regards the general plan, brings his personages and his characters on the stage, in such a way that his collaborateur has simply to follow his indications to bring the whole together and to write the verses." The best of his librettis is "Aïda," the author of which, M. du Locle, says, in a letter, that he wrote it "scene by scene, phrase by phrase, under the eye of the maestro, who took a large share in the work. The idea of the finale of the last act, with its two stages, one above the other, belongs especially to him." In his "Otello" Verdi has been still more fortunate in having the services of Signor Boïto, who, being an able composer, knows just what a musician wants.

This is not the place to discuss the merits of Verdi's music, but it is amusing to read that in Paris and London for a long time he was declared to be no melodist. If his operas should not survive the present century, the fault will not be a lack of melody, but a lack of concentration and elaboration of details. Wagner required two or three years of hard labor to complete a score, every page of which bears evidence of his genius. Verdi did not go to such extremes in the opposite direction as some of his predecessors, who often wrote an opera in a fortnight (their names are still preserved); he usually devoted four months to an opera. "Rigoletto" was written in forty days, and "Don Carlos" in six months. "Aïda," which is by far the best of his operas, owes some of its excellence to the fact that the scenery prepared for its first performance was locked up in Paris during the Prussian siege, which gave Verdi opportunity to retouch and polish his score.

ANCIENT ISRAEL.—I.

Geschichte des Volkes Israel. Von Dr. Bernhard Stade, Professor an der Universität Giessen. Mit Illustrationen und Karten. Vol. I. Berlin. 1887. New York: Westermann. ['Oncken's Weltgeschichte in Einzeldarstellungen.']

Half a century ago, ancient Israelitish history was generally written as Roman history was before Niebuhr. It began with Ur of the Chaldees and the stories of the patriarchs, just as the history of Rome began with Alba Longa, its kings, and Romulus and Remus. The narratives of Genesis, Exodus, Joshua, or Judges were repeated like the legends of Livy, as traditions containing much that is naturally impossible, but on the whole historical. The story of Sarah's maternity might be left untold, like that of Rhea Silvia's, but the wonderful escape of the infant Moses appeared more natural than that of Romulus, the capture of Jericho was recorded like that of Veii, and the regicide of Ehud like the deed of Mucius Scævola. The miraculous was reverently separated from the naturally possible, and this presented as history. Jacob migrated with his family through Canaan, though he may not have wrestled with God or an angel; Moses gave to his people laws at Sinai, no matter whether the mountain smoked or not; Joshua routed the Canaanites at Gibeon, the sun standing or moving; Samson again and again smote the Philistines, though never, perhaps, with the jaw-bone of an ass. This manner of writing the early history of Israel has now become almost obsolete, though not through the powerful efforts of any single Niebuhr in this field.

Israelitish history has been slowly but completely revolutionized by the steady and progressive labor of many eminent scholars, mostly German. The discoveries of Egyptology and Assyriology have had their share in the work. Biblical criticism, an evolution of very old growth, has paved the way for critical history, which, after emancipating itself from the bondage of orthodoxy about the close of the last century, has in our time succeeded in throwing off also the shackles of literary tradition. Ewald's 'Geschichte des Volkes Israel,' which made its appearance more than forty years ago, marks the first great advance. But Ewald was more bold than free, more suggestive than sound; he stimulated to further work without laying foundations. Hitzig, whose smaller history with the same title (1869) followed Ewald's last edition, was freer, almost reckless, in the treatment of details, but not more independent of the traditional views concerning the composition and comparative documentary value of the Pentateuch narratives. But almost simultaneously with Hitzig's book appeared, in Holland, Kuenen's 'Godsdienst van Israël,' which, clearly developing the results successively matured by Vatke, Reuss, and Graf as to the growth of Israelitish religion and legislation, presented a wholly transformed aspect of both the history and historical literature of the people. Wellhausen, in his 'Geschichte Israels' (vol. i, 1878) and other writings, has carried out in grand style, and firmly established, the "Graf and Kuenen theory." Stade, in the volume before us, stands on the same basis, but goes a little beyond Wellhausen in historical and literary iconoclasm, and evinces sufficient independent research and original ingenuity to take a place among the successive leading writers on the subject. To define his standpoint is to sketch the latest stage at which Israelitish historiography, led by the strings of Biblical text criticism and archæology, has arrived in Germany and Holland. Let us hear him first as to the narrative sources of his history.

The Pentateuch was composed of original documents of widely different character. It embraces two works presenting the early legends of the people, written with the object of glorifying the national worship; two law books; and a work comprising both legend and law. Its Hebrew name, Torah (law), is derived from the book of laws discovered during the reign of King Josiah, in 621 B. C., which forms now a part of the so-called fifth book of Moses, or Deuteronomy. Its oldest original document is the historical writing of a Judæan narrator, now distinguished as the Jehovist, from the constant use of the name Jehovah. This document contains mainly mythical accounts referring to the patriarchs, Moses, and the sacred spots in Canaan. It was probably composed in the latter half of the ninth century B. C. The next in age is the work of the Ephraimitish Elohist, often called the second Elohist, from whom we have the Decalogue, and whose images of God (whom in his recitals of pre-Mosaic events he calls Elohim) are less anthropomorphic than those of the older narrator. It was written about 750 B. C. These two works were loosely woven into one, about a century and a quarter later, by a writer imbued with the spirit of the prophetic productions of the preceding periods, who may be designated as the first or pre-Deuteronomic redactor. The same (or else the later Deuteronomistic) redactor may have inserted the third component part, the so-called Book of the Covenant (contained in Ex. xx-xxiv), a codified collection of ancient law usages, probably executed about 690 B. C. A more important component part is the Torah discovered and promulgated in 621, the Deuteronomy proper—with an historical introduction and exhortative supplements—in the spirit of which some of the older narratives were redactorially modified. The youngest part is the Priestly Codex, or the Groundwork, composed in Babylonian exile. It consists of legal enactments and narrative portions. The former, though ascribed to Mosaic revelation, were elaborated for use in the restored Jewish state and temple; the latter gave a post-exilian coloring to the patriarchal history of Israel. A later redactor—Ezra or a man of his time, about 460 B. C.—joined the Groundwork to the older historical parts, adapted the latter to the chronological plan of the former, and completed the Pentateuchal compilation.

Very similar in composition is the book of Joshua, which, in fact, forms with the Pentateuch a larger whole, now frequently designated as the Hexateuch. It contains little of the narrative of the Jehovist, has ample extracts from the (second) Elohist, shows the same Deuteronomistic varnishing, and comprises portions of the Groundwork. The Jehovist knew no Joshua as conqueror of the land west of the Jordan; the Elohist recounted this conquest under Joshua—originally an Ephraimitish hero—in imitation of the legends of Moses's conquest of the Transjordanic lands; the Groundwork fully transformed Joshua into a second Moses. A redactor later than Ezra combined all these component parts into the present book, when the Pentateuch had already obtained its canonical sanction as the Torah. The Torah alone was accepted by the Samaritans as canonical. Even additions of a later period, which are wanting in the Septuagint version, are discoverable in Joshua. The book of Judges is a still freer, unauthentic compilation. Its heroes are almost all unhistorical; they are heroes eponymi, legendary representatives of clans. Thus Jephthah is designated as the son of Gilead, and Gilead, like Gad, designates a tribe and its territory. What is related of his fight with the Ephraimites is an imitation of the story of Gideon. His fight with the Ammonites is told without any tangible features. The names of the Judges Ehud, Elon, Tola, and Jair appear elsewhere in lists of towns and clans. That Ibzan and Abdon are eponymi representing clans is evident from the fact that only their places and the numbers of their children are stated. "These remarks will have proved that a period of judges preceding the period of kings cannot be spoken of seriously." There were kings, or chiefs of clans, like Gideon or Shamgar, but no judges of Israel. There was no united Israel then, and still less an Israel theoretically organized, such as the story of the struggle with Benjamin at Gibeah presents to us. This story is a Tendenzroman, "contradicting everything we know of Hebrew antiquities." Ruth is a post-exilian idyl, also composed for a purpose. The picture of Samuel, in the first book of that name, shows most clearly "the character of Hebrew historical tradition by its transformation of the traditional matter." In the oldest traditional form Samuel is a seer and priest of the Ephraimitish town of Ramah. Later he is brought into connection with the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh, as the true heir to the priesthood of the house of Eli. Still later he is transformed into a prophet in the style of Amos or Isaiah, who fearlessly steps before the king and declares that God likes obedience better than sacrifice. The second book of Samuel and the books of Kings contain, of course, more genuinely historical matter, but even the contents of the last-named work are "partly worthless and almost everywhere deficient." Entirely untrustworthy is Chronicles, in whatever it does not directly draw from the other books of the canon, although here and there valuable threads are woven into its tissues.

All these books, as we now have them, are thus very deceptive guides as to the earlier periods. And yet they contain a vast amount of information. To make their accounts valuable a constant application of critical operations is needed, in which the historian is guided by the light derived from Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and other prophets, whose writings not only are true mirrors of their own times, but also clearly reflect the conditions of things in preceding ages. A few poetical fragments of older date, imbedded in the historical relations, can also be turned to good account. Every historical book, every narrative, must be analyzed and dissected into its component parts; the original text and its age, if possible, discovered; every addition, insertion, interpolation—and they are numberless—found out, examined, and reduced to its proper value; concurrent, explanatory, or contradictory testimony compared and weighed; everything spurious fearlessly rejected. Out of the saved residue the tissue of genuine history must be rewoven. The analytical work of free criticism has been carried on with unremitting zeal, and often with corresponding ingenuity and success, for more than a century; the reconstructing process is of our own age. The minor results obtained are very numerous, much rests on plausible conjecture, and much is still covered with obscurity. The general aspect of history is changed, as we shall see.

HAYWARD'S CORRESPONDENCE.

A Selection from the Correspondence of Abraham Hayward, Q.C., from 1834 to 1884. With an Account of his Early Life. Edited by Henry E. Carlisle. 2 vols. Scribner & Welford. 1887.

Mr. Hayward, alluding at the end of his life to his literary début as the translator of "Faust," humorously remarks: "Lady Blanche Hozier asked me, the other day, if I read German; and it is by no means the first time that the same question has been put to me." It is as the author of that excellent prose version of Goethe's great work, published more than half a century ago, that his name is best known, though he has a reputation of another sort as a critic, which rests upon the solid and copious volumes of his reviews. He was born in 1801, and, after school days, was articled to a solicitor, and in due course entered at the Inner Temple. He joined the famous London Debating Society which Mill and the philosophical Radicals had founded, where he supported the Tory side, and in 1828 he became editor of the Law Magazine, which was established to further the cause of law reform. Out of his interest in this subject grew some relations with the law professors at Göttingen, whom he visited in 1831, and this was the beginning of his extensive acquaintance on the Continent, which was afterwards of great influence on his career. The immediate literary result of this trip to Germany was the translation of "Faust," issued in 1833, which at once gave its author the position of a known man of letters. Mr. Hayward remained a working lawyer, however, and received in 1845 an appointment to the rank of Queen's Counsel; but this advancement, giving rise to a professional quarrel in consequence of the Benchers refusing the customary election to their body, practically terminated his legal career. He had been received into society, and, as he was already in association with eminent party men, he fell naturally into politics, as one of the Peelites, and was a main support of the Morning Chronicle while it was in the interest of that coterie. His labors in journalism were signalized by his writing a leading article on an important debate, on the bill for the repeal of the Navigation Laws, in season for the morning's paper—a feat of which it is said: "It revolutionized at a stroke the whole art of leader-writing, and statesmen found all at once that, with a quiet man of letters sitting in a corner of the gallery with a bit of pencil, they had to lay their account for prompt and energetic criticism in the newspapers the next day, concurrently with the publication of their own speeches, instead of criticism the day after, when the speeches had done their work."

The close connection with public life which Mr. Hayward formed in the course of these years was maintained by him; and, though he was never in the House or in Government, his place in society, his long experience and his abilities, and a certain knowledge of men, sustained him in an unofficial position of influence. Thiers made him the channel of advice during the Crimean war; and in 1870, during the former's diplomatic tour to solicit the good offices of the Powers in behalf of France, his first visit in England was at the rooms of his old friend. Slidell, of Confederate fame, also used Mr. Hayward as a means of communication in his efforts to obtain recognition for his Government; and, in connection with this, one notes a call he made on Motley at Vienna in 1862, whom he found "more unreasonable than ever, vowing that the restoration of the Union in its entirety was 'as sure as the sun in heaven.'" In the changes of the Ministries, especially in the days of coalition, Mr. Hayward was en rapport with the principals, and occasionally was useful in personal negotiations. It was on services of this nature, in the formation of Lord Aberdeen's Cabinet, that he grounded his application for a Charity Commissionership, which failed; and it is curious to note his observation on this incident: "When men work together for a party object, they are all entitled, in their several ways, to a share in the advantage of success." This is not the spoils doctrine, for which it might be mistaken, but that of party reward in filling new or vacant offices as against the aristocratic system of nepotism.

Mr. Hayward never obtained any of the material fruits of political service, though a second attempt was made for him in later years. He was successively in intimate relations with Lyndhurst, Newcastle, Palmerston, and Gladstone, and apparently grew liberal with his times. It is amusing to find him dismissing Disraeli in 1850 in a couple of lines as "very nearly if not quite forgotten"; and he adds, "How soon one of these puffed-up reputations goes down!" In 1880 he writes, "I have been longing for the fall of the Disraeli Government as I did for the fall of the Second Empire." He had taken his name off the Carlton Club in 1870, having apparently had the experience of much bad manners there, after it became more a strictly political club than it was in the first part of the century; and he was evidently a thorough-going Liberal when he died, as we read in one of his last letters, "During my long life I never remember a period when the English people were less Radical than now." Ten years ago Gladstone was writing to him in respect to the obstructiveness of the Upper Ten Thousand in the political progress of the century, to the same effect as was the language he used upon the stump in the last campaign. Hayward's interest in politics continued unabated until his death.

In the whole course of his career he was a careful and fluent writer, being reckoned the best of the essayists of the old school; and since, in his later years, he had the great advantage of treating of men whom he had known all about in life, his work has a special interest and value. Literature consequently shares with politics the pages of this correspondence, which derives considerable lustre from the many distinguished names among the signatures. At the date of the beginning of the series Mr. Hayward was thirty-three years old, and had already given some of those little dinners at his rooms in the Temple for which he was afterward noted. He gathered there intellectual men and brilliant women, and in particular he exercised hospitality toward foreigners; men so various as Gen. von Radowitz, Louis Blanc, and the poet Dupont, being among his guests. He gives in one place a few instances of the ignorance of one another among the eminent writers of Europe that had come under his observation. Manzoni did not know Bulwer by name in 1834; Schlegel, arriving in England in 1832, had not heard of Macaulay; M. Charles Dupin did not know of Babbage's 'Manufactures' four months after publication; and Say, the economist, was unacquainted with Whately's name, though Mr. Hayward found in Say's library at the time a presentation copy of the 'Lectures' "from the Archbishop of Dublin." At Mr. Hayward's rooms such international indifference was as likely to be corrected as anywhere in London. He made many short journeys to the Continent, usually to Paris, and thus renewed and strengthened old ties and formed new ones; but his travels dealt with persons of distinction and affairs, and were fruitful only of information and social alliances. The mass of his correspondence, consequently, is wide in range of acquaintance, and friendly in tone; there is in it naturally a very large proportion of what is transitory and not a little that is trivial —society and political news, the record of dinners, the chances of Parliament, ministerial changes, etc. The whole is a very heterogeneous collection of notes and letters, light and serious, dull and entertaining, but it affords a fair retrospect of half a century of London life in the world of affairs and entertainment. Of the substance it is to be said that it has less solid value than one would have expected.

The literary portion is extraordinarily meagre. The best of the letters are from the sprightly pen of Mrs. Norton; and the feminine correspondence in general is the most pleasant feature of the volumes. Very few of the letters, however, deal with literary reputations either in the way of anecdote or criticism. In reply to a request for material for an essay upon Rogers, Mrs. Norton writes very justly of him as a small man filling a miraculously large place in the world, and defines his individuality by saying that tastes were to him what passions are to other men: "He did nothing rash. I am sure Rogers as a baby never fell down, unless he was pushed; but walked from chair to chair of the drawing-room furniture steadily and quietly till he reached the place where the sunbeam fell on the carpet." He preferred a lullaby to the merriest game of romps, she thinks, and would have begged that his long clothes might be made of fine mull muslin instead of cambric, which was capable of a thing "he loathed, starch." Lady Dufferin writes on the same subject: "I never could lash myself into a feeling of affection or admiration for him. . . . I have heard him say many graceful things, but few kind ones, and he never seemed to me thoroughly in earnest save in expressing contempt or dislike. . . . It seemed a positive pain to him to hear any modern poet praised, and I remember his treating me with a rudeness almost bearish because I indiscreetly avowed how much I admired Tennyson's 'Princess.'" She then tells the anecdote of being accidentally left in the dark with him, and his jest: "Ah, my dear, if sweet seventy-eight could come again! Mais ces beaux jours sont passés." Besides these brief passages on Rogers there is really nothing of interest in regard to the world of letters, except an opinion of Bulwer's on Macaulay, in which he remarks that the historian's acquaintance with the world—that is, with men's actual characters—was slight, and then recites what are now the commonplaces of criticism on Macaulay (but this was in 1861)—that his style excludes many of the nobler excellences, being without modesty or suggestiveness, and is, besides, indebted to coarse tricks of art in color and contrast, while the secret of his vogue is discovered in his relieving his readers from any necessity to think. Apropos of a wordy letter of Carlyle's, Mr. Hayward himself writes: "I never yet followed him to the authorities without finding him wrong. In my 'Essay on Marshal Saxe' I have proved from signed documents that Carlyle's labored account of the battle of Fontenoy is essentially incorrect. He is a man of genius, undoubtedly, but he has injured instead of improving literature and taste; and, as to his conversation, if he spoke English and attended to the rules of good breeding, its charm for the mass of his admirers would disappear." In another place is an equally brief judgment on Balzac, whom he was rereading in his seventy-eighth year and found not to improve: "the fineness of observation and analysis of feeling are undeniable, but his descriptions, both of places and characters, are tediously spun out, his plots teem with improbability, and he has a vulgar fondness for wealth and rank."

These extracts practically comprise the entire literary interest of the two volumes; nor are there any anecdotes by the way to speak of, if we except the droll suggestion of Hook to Lord Lyndhurst, who had come to a dinner with gold-laced trousers, that "to appear with all his glories he should reverse his position in the chair." Lord Lyndhurst appears very agreeably in the earlier pages, but death soon removed him. To him is attributed the witticism apropos of Mme. Genlis's keeping her books in detached cases, the male authors in one and the female in the other, that the reason was "she did not wish to add to her library"—a joke unfairly claimed by James Smith.

Of the correspondence with public men, that of Sir Henry Bulwer (Lord Dalling) is of most note. In his long and varied service he had experience of state affairs in many lands, and his remarks are pointed, shrewd, and sensible. Writing of the Ionian Island difficulty in 1863, he illustrates his width of view and soundness of principle: "The tendency to resign empire is a dangerous one for an empire to fall into; but if a people wish to get out of your hands, and public opinion is not for keeping them, a Minister in what is called, and is, a free country can have no policy of his own in the matter." And, again, of the Eastern question, in the same year, he states the function of England very aptly as being "to prevent no government taking the place of some government, and urging and helping a bad government to be better than it was." As the negotiator of the Bulwer-Clayton Treaty, what he thought of our diplomacy has some interest, and he expressed his opinion very frankly on the question of the indirect claims being urged under the Washington Treaty: "When I had to make a treaty with them [the American statesmen] I took the trouble of going over all their own treaties, and only using in important passages such words as they had used, in the sense in which they had used them. Then when they began their usual disputes about interpretation, I quoted their own authority. All their own newspapers acknowledged I was right." Sir Henry's mode of meeting his cousins in diplomacy was one of commendable safety. He exhibits solidity and sense on all occasions where he is met in these letters, and yet there was a vein of daring in him hardly consonant with his caution. His characterization of Peel as a state-clock which was silent till it struck the hour, is admirable, as are also his observations on the inconveniences of such a political time-piece in a representative Government.

There are one or two interesting communications from Mr. A. G. Dunlop about Spain, in which he notices that Spanish art was a temporary importation from Italy, as Spanish wealth was from America, and both almost to be classed as matters of chance, not national development; and he contrasts the Spanish peasant with the Italian, South German, or Greek people, as without appreciation of art, not caring for flowers or trees even, and staring at pictures only because they are "holy" and appeal to his superstition. He adds that the Spaniards are likewise without any desire for knowledge, and declares there is no avenir for the pure-blooded race: "If the Spaniard remain any longer as he is in spite of railways and increased intercourse, the commerce of the seaboard will more and more slip away into the hands of foreigners—French, German, Swede, English—and the pure race (native) will fall back on the interior and inland villages, hewers of wood and drawers of water." There are letters, too, from Lady Clanricarde (daughter of George Canning), with excellent passages on the condition of Ireland, worth reading now as evidence of the long-established, long well-known state of affairs there. "It appears to me," she says, "contrary to all I have seen or read that a great amount of discontent continuing in a country should not produce serious results of some sort." This concludes the list of really notable letters in the department of public affairs.

Of Mr. Hayward himself one forms a conception not very deeply marked. Mr. W. E. Forster says that the unique characteristic of his political thought and experience was "the result of a curious combination of a hard, worldly, even cynical appreciation of men and things, with strong sympathy with popular movements, and ideal aspirations." He had enemies and prejudices; but his strength of character seems to have included independence, sincerity, and perfect courage as elements, and he was undoubtedly liberalized by the variety of his associations with other minds. His career was laborious and honored, and one cannot but regret that he left no more extensive and notable memoirs, as he might well have done. This correspondence is but a meagre substitute.

CONWAY'S EARLY FLEMISH ARTISTS.

Early Flemish Artists and their Predecessors on the Lower Rhine. By Wm. Martin Conway. Macmillan & Co. 1887.

PROF. CONWAY has given us a very interesting and exhaustive book on the character and affiliation of the earliest naturalistic school of painting which has ever existed, so far as we know. If, in his bent in favor of the art in which he has in his past studies most interested himself, he has now and then lost sight of the great standard of absolute art, we need not therefore disparage his admirable summary of that art which is his specialty. When, for instance, he says, "Enter beneath the sculptured portal of Our Lady of Paris, and say, have any people (even the Greeks themselves) attained higher rank in the expression of noble thought through the language of the chisel? Has the brush of the painter been more deftly wielded than by the tender hand of a Wilhelm of Köln?" we are compelled to bring him to book on the terminology of art, because "higher rank" means higher artistic achievement in expression of the ideal, and a higher degree of refinement in that expression; and, with all admiration for the fertility of invention and decorative instinct of the Gothic church builders, we must maintain that Greek sculpture is higher art than Gothic, since it is carried nearer to the perfection of those qualities of expression which are the especial raison d'être of plastic art. Neither can we accept his estimate of the comparative qualities of Gothic color (p. 4), or the political dignity of a "world-emperor and a world-bishop," which are entities only possible in the dark ages whose exaltation as a world epoch Prof. Conway has undertaken. Nor can we admit the distinctions drawn between mediæval and modern relations between art and religion as he has stated them. That there was a difference is certain, for now we have little of that form of religious feeling which hinges on belief in a priesthood or the necessity of churches to faith, nor have we any great amount of serious or really sincere art; but it is a part of a great idealizing process we too generally indulge in, in reference to the past, to say that

"the life of Christ, to the Gothic mind, was a permeating influence in the whole course of human life. The husbandman at his plough and the churchman at his prayers were alike fulfilling their heaven-appointed task, and were alike performing a religious action. For this reason you will find that the Gothic church bears always in prominent position representations of the occupations of the months of the year, these occupations being as much a part of the Christian religion as the events of the life of Christ himself."

So far as the influence of the true life and character of Christ are concerned, they had as little to do with human life in Gothic spheres as now, and as much as the life of Buddha—it was the ecclesiastical organization and the heavy mastery of the priesthood, forbidding thought to rise beyond its control, which made the life of the dark ages so full of the imagery of the Christian religion. The churchman as little thought of heaven in his prayers as the husbandman at his plough, and, in one sense, therefore, they were "alike" sincere. Heaven no more belongs to the fools than the knaves, and ignorance was the gift of the husbandman as hypocrisy and sanctimony of the priest, through the properly so-called dark ages, which were dark in spite of art, because human reason and human liberty were alike darkened by the "world-emperor and the world-bishop" of Prof. Conway's admiration.

We might object seriously to the large portico made before the history of painting by the dissertation on Gothic sculpture, but at least our author might, in giving his subject true proportions, have made more account of the share which Byzantine art in both branches had in the general result, and ask what he means by the sentence, "When the Jewish philosophers introduced the commentaries of Averroës and the Arabians to the philosophers of Christendom, and thereby gave substance to the nascent opposition of Nominalist and Realist, they sowed the seed which was in due time to produce that convulsed offspring—the Reformation." We are disposed to question all the conclusions of Prof. Conway based on hypothetical religious influences, which are a very dubious part of the true motives of any art, though they do indisputably provide subjects for its exercise. Religion, coupled with intelligence, leads to freedom and right—its form is secondary in the consideration; coupled with ignorance, it becomes superstition, and this has been the same in all epochs and countries and with all forms of belief. "The religion of the thirteenth century," says our author, "was one for free use at every moment of the day. It mingled in and tended to sanctify every act of life. Barter and sale, manufacture and war, alike presented their religious aspect at that noble time." But there is no evidence whatever that any change has taken place in human nature, or that there were more honest men in the thirteenth century than to-day, or that good work of any kind was more due to religious sincerity than now. What made art more sincere, if it was so, was the fact that the artist was regarded as a craftsman, and held to the same standard as the weaver, the blacksmith, etc., etc., and to a strictly commercial responsibility, while now art rarely ministers to anything but a poor personal vanity or a formal and insincere devotion. The history of the guilds of the various arts and trades, which the author traces in great fulness, is therefore of the highest interest, and will explain better than any other agency the qualities of the mediæval artist:

"Painting, to the mediæval mind, was a craft like any other, and was therefore organized in the usual way. A painter did not look upon himself and was not regarded [by others] as a person superior to ordinary discipline. It is only in times of decay that artists give themselves airs, and require to be considered in a Bohemian category of their own. In the great ages of art painters lived like other craftsmen, and were paid for the work they did according to a fair scale of remuneration."

The chapter on the guild system and its effect upon art may be studied with great profit. What Prof. Conway says on the character of fifteenth-century art is sometimes indicative of his incomplete technical knowledge, as, for instance, where he compares Titian with the Flemings, saying: "Painters like Titian, whose pictures from beginning to end seldom took so many days as those of a Fleming occupied months, might with little sacrifice abandon any unpromising work and start afresh." He might have learned that Titian was occupied always for months on his pictures, and that the appearance of dash and energy in the finished result was simply the foundation, which showed through repeated and most studious repainting. So far from being the facile work Prof. Conway imagines it, Titian's process was long and complicated, and required the most absolute certainty in its beginnings. But in what he says of the philosophy of art he is more correct:

"The historian of art has it continually forced upon him that with the growth of civilization the artistic power of the human species by no means continually increases. What was possible to a less developed generation is impossible to one more advanced; and indeed it is hard to avoid the conclusion that the artistic powers of the human race, far from increasing in periods of general progress, may often notably diminish. It would seem, then, that certain forms of art prot duction, beautiful enough in themselves to excite the wonder and admiration of succeeding ages, are possible only to a semi-developed race, and demand an order of intellect inferior to that of the after-coming men who yet must bow before them in delighted awe."

The fact is well stated, but to explain it it is only necessary to remember that the growth of the rationalistic and æsthestic powers does not run in parallel lines. The latter is emotional, and emotion is checked and often deprived of its normal outcome by the domination of reason. As human progress goes on, it involves large alternations of development—reason and feeling taking by turns the guidance; and art is only possible in any of its true phases when feeling controls the intellectual activity. What we call "progress," which means to us simply progress in scientific attainment, has nothing to do with art; for, as Prof. Conway says, "Art gains very little [he might have said nothing] from the progress of science." But what he says further on, "Hence the art of any generation depends not upon its knowledge but upon its ideals of Faith and Hope," is not true, for faith is an intellectual exercise and hope one of temperament, possibly artistic and possibly not, while art is emotional and imaginative; and though, as mental influences, religion and devotion may prove quickening to any emotional tendency, it is only as any other cause of emotion, as love or the influences of nature, may be.

We have only space to say that, as is general in English illustrated art works, the present illustrations are quite unworthy of the text, and such as an American publisher should, and probably would, be ashamed of. They answer an educational purpose, but give a book a cheap and unconsidered aspect.

Dr. Channing's Note Book. Passages from the unpublished MSS. of William Ellery Channing. Selected by his granddaughter, Grace

Ellery Channing. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1887.

THE origin of these 'Notes' is not made so clear by the editress in her preface as one could wish. We are told that they "are from unpublished MSS. left by him [Dr. Channing] and set apart for this purpose by his nephew and biographer, William Henry Channing, and his son." "For this purpose" means, presumably, for the purpose of this or some similar volume; but "unpublished MSS." suggests something different from the memoranda which Miss Channing's material appears to have been, judging from subsequent expressions. That "it was Dr. Channing's habit to make notes at all times" is another doubtful phrase, suggesting a more engrossing habit of note-taking than our knowledge of the man permits us to attribute to him. The editing is better than the preface, but here and there we find an obvious slip. On page 7, we should certainly read, "If I have been invigorated," and not, "If I have invigorated." On page 8 the second paragraph should have been omitted, unless the place meant by "here" could have been bracketed. As it stands, it reflects too severely upon Boston. On page 100, "sensualist" should be "sensationalist," even if Dr. Channing wrote the former, as he surely did not mean it. On page 19, "Past powers" should evidently be "Vast powers."

Dr. Channing's style was so little aphoristic or epigrammatic, its stream was so essential to its effect, that he appears to better advantage in these brief, disconnected paragraphs than we should have imagined that he would. Not that he is often aphoristic or epigrammatic here, but he is so at times, and generally the sentences in their isolation are more impressive and agreeable than isolated sentences are apt to be. Even such admirable separate sentences as those of Joubert and Amiel kill each other by juxtaposition, like many pictures together in a gallery. Of the more epigrammatic, one of the best examples is on page 14: "The suppression of the multitude by force is not order. It is rebellion kept down." "We must become our own friends" is shorter and as good. The sentences are grouped under about fifty different heads. Those under the head of "Slavery" show how swift was his deduction of anti-slavery principles from the dignity of human nature: "I would no more think of owning a man than of owning the earth or heavens." The following, which comes just before the slavery section, should have been included in it, for it evidently refers to Garrison and his coadjutors: "Is any class of men to be so honored as those who espouse the cause of the most friendless, and who can gain nothing but reproach, who make no compromise with opinion?" The section on "Self-Culture" has the ring of Emerson's "Self-Reliance": "To give ourselves up to others to be guided, controlled, and so forth, is to betray our trust." "Is not the mind to be made strong by exposure? must it be housed, nursed, kept within limits? may it not be trusted amidst all kinds of opinions? Let us associate with the wise as friends, but, like Jesus, dine with sinners." His individualism is of the same piece with these sentences, and is another proof of the substantial unity of his thought with Emerson's: "I may desire others' virtue, but must not interfere with their freedom." "It were better for a man to do a wrong act in obeying his own conscience, than a right one in obeying mine." This, under the head "Thought: Reason," is well put: "Doubt must have the authority of reason. How, then, can we doubt its authority?" And this also: "The very question why we trust our faculties is an appeal to them." Under the head "God: Religion" we have these unconventional opinions: "We have no forms in domestic life. Friendship has none. Is not religion more free?" "It is as incongruous to profess religion as to profess benevolence." "The adoration of goodness—this is religion": a sentence that some modern Unitarian conservatives will very much regret.

Dr. Channing, as did Parker after him, contemplated an opus magnum. Parker's was to be a history of religion. The exigencies of the anti-slavery conflict prevented its completion. Channing's was to be a treatise on psychology. His health was not equal to the necessary labor. The sentences included by Miss Channing under the last six or seven sections of her little book are from the notes he made for that intended work. They indicate that it would have had little formal exactness, hardly more than Emerson's Essays. They also indicate that we must class him with the transcendentalists. His idealism is only less absolute than Emerson's, after Fichte. It is that of Kant—allowing the not-me, but insisting on its plastic character: "The truth is, our sensations flow from us and furnish the universe with its varying robes." "It is the soul which aggrandizes nature."

The Rise and Early Constitution of Universities, with a Survey of Mediæval Education. By S. S. Laurie, LL.D. [International Education Series.] D. Appleton & Co. 1887.

IN three hundred pages, Prof. Laurie of Edinburgh presents an interesting study of the higher education of Europe during a period which stretches from the ninth to the fourteenth century. Two introductory chapters exhibit briefly the character of preceding Greek and Roman schools, and also the changes which came about when cloister and cathedral began to appropriate learning to themselves and to teach those who were to conduct their offices. The closing chapters repeat in topical form the results of the previous survey. They discuss the changes of meaning in the term university, and gather together the more important facts about the university studies, students, faculties, privileges, discipline, and graduation. A somewhat abstract preface by Dr. W. T. Harris opens the book, and no index ends it.

Prof. Laurie's thesis is, that until the fourteenth century there was no conscious founding of universities. A university grew, and was not made. The germ from which it started was usually some religious foundation. An ecclesiastical school began to admit lay pupils and to teach its trivium and quadrivium with some relation to secular life. With the enlargement of learning and the increase of civic liberties, came the need of specialized studies to supplement the ordinary work in arts. A great teacher—Constantine, Imerius, William of Champeaux, or Abelard—then gave so decisive an impulse to a single class of studies in his locality, that the place became known as the home of medicine, law, or theology, and attracted thither other teachers and students of similar tastes. An epoch was thus created in the development of the school. A university began—that is, a community of the learned—which soon assumed privileges of organization, self-government, and exemption from public burdens such as at that time were commonly accorded to trade guilds. The towns found the presence of large companies of scholars commercially valuable, and readily conceded moderate claims for privilege. In case of conflict with the towns, an appeal to pope or sovereign for protection generally brought a recognition as authoritative as any modern charter could give. These modes of semi-conscious growth the author illustrates at length by the examples of Salernum, Bologna, and Paris; the more intentional foundations, by the case of Prague.

For English readers this book probably offers the best brief account of the important subject with which it deals. Most teachers who read it will gain something. Yet it cannot be called a good piece of work. For treating coherently so long and complex a period in so brief a space, elaborate preliminary studies of original authorities are essential; and no less essential is the artistic planning of a scheme by which the mass of matter may be brought economically and in neat sequence before the reader's attention. There are no signs of such studies here, or of any such painstaking purpose to ease the student. Most of the authorities, when cited at all, are given at second-hand; and though each sentence is clear, there is no even development of the argument from cover to cover. Hundreds of valuable facts are shovelled together, with many repetitions, omissions, and allusions. Do we praise or condemn when we call the book "suggestive"?

The Military Annals of Tennessee: Confederate. First Series: Embracing a review of military operations, with regimental histories and memorial rolls, compiled from original and official sources, and edited by John Berrien Lindsley, M.D., D.D. Printed for subscribers. Nashville: J. M. Lindsley & Co. 1886.

THIS is certainly a remarkable book. It is one of those publications of which Macaulay said they might have been light reading before the Deluge, when one who died at six hundred was regarded as having been cut off in his prime. Dr. Lindsley's book contains 910 closely printed pages, the steel engravings, of which there are about two score, not being included. And yet this is but the beginning. We are soon to have "The Index of Officers and the Index of Men," containing the names of 8,000 officers and 60,000 men. This in turn will be followed by a third series, giving biographical notes of the prominent Confederates. This last will complete the Confederate Annals. Dr. Lindsley will then undertake, on a commensurate scale, the general history of Tennessee, and will "edit and publish a series of volumes covering the whole field." It is possible that even the antediluvians might have rebelled at this point. Tennessee, Kentucky, and Louisiana are the only Southern States, not of the Continental Confederation, which have received extended historical treatment. But, with the exception of the "Commonwealth Series," almost exclusive attention has been paid to the early settlers. 'The Military Annals of Tennessee' is, in this respect, a pleasant exception.

We cannot but think Dr. Lindsley has made a mistake in the plan he has adopted. With all due respect for the brave men who fought for the Confederate cause, the monument can be justly considered out of proportion to the subject. In its present form, the book will hardly meet with any popular acceptance even in Tennessee, beyond those whom patriotic motives actuate. Outside of the State, its circulation will be confined to public libraries and compilers of encyclopædias. With the rest of the series, we have now nothing to do. But granting the plan of the present book, we are compelled to rate very high the execution of its details. It might be called simply a collection of regimental histories and memorial rolls. Each regiment of infantry and each regiment of cavalry receives separate treatment, the rolls being preceded in most cases by short sketches written by some one actively engaged in its campaigns. Most of the memorial rolls are official, having been copied from the archives in the War Department, by permission of Secretary Lincoln. The opening article is by J. M. Keating, on "Tennessee for Four Years the Theatre of War, 1861 to 1865," a concise and at times rather graphic account of the part played by Tennessee, or of the scenes enacted on Tennessee soil, during the progress of the great tragedy. Gen. A. P. Stewart's monograph (for such it is) on "The Army of Tennessee" is very fine of its kind, and is like a guiding lamp to one attempting to explore the caverns of this book.

The historical value, or, more accurately, the value to historians, of this work is very great. It cannot, of course, claim to be history—it hardly deserves the title of annals—archives would have been the proper word. But it supplies valuable material for the use of some future historian. If Dr. Lindsley carries out his present plan in reference to the general history of Tennessee, he will supply a mass of historical data surpassing the 'Annales Germaniæ.' It is an additional evidence of progressive enterprise as well as of the awakening of renewed literary activity in the South, that such a volume could have been written and printed exclusively in a State which, less than a quarter of a century ago, was one of the battle-grounds of a great civil war.

The typographical execution of the book is decidedly good and tasteful. The paper is thick and heavy, the type clear, the errors of the typesetter few, and the margin comfortably broad. The numerous steel engravings are equal to the average of such work.

Souvenirs of my Time. By Jessie Benton Frémont. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

MR. FRÉMONT belongs among that class of specially endowed women who are born to give social pleasure, of which the dames of the French salons are the historical type; and in her day she has seen so many interesting phases of life, and has gathered such a store of anecdotes by merely looking on at what was doing about her, that she makes reminiscence an unfailing source of entertainment. In this volume, which unfortunately is disfigured by some wretched illustrations, she directly addresses young people rather than the general public; but this need not really limit her audience, and it allows of a familiarity in tone, a conversational pitch, and a freedom which are natural graces, and harmonize well with her high spirits, vivacity, and light touch. As the daughter of Senator Benton she saw much of Washington society in its ante-bellum days, and, by virtue of her Virginia family connection, she knew well the men and manners of the Old Dominion, while, her father's home being at St. Louis, she spent a considerable part of her early life in the atmosphere of its old French and western-border associations. Afterwards, as the wife of General Frémont, she saw New Orleans and the Isthmus in a very familiar way on her journey to join him, in the California times; and when she reached San Francisco she began a new chapter of strange experience, in the course of which she discovered Bret Harte. The last half of her volume is devoted to foreign parts, where she had advantages in seeing whatever was to her taste; and she describes some scenes with English and Danish royalty in the foreground, a delightful Tyrolese excursion, and the Paris of the Second Empire, with the same enjoyment in them and eye for their qualities as she shows in her earlier political and pioneering recollections.

This is, we should say, preëminently a woman's book. The womanly element pervades it. The home of the Bentons, at Washington and St. Louis, is described with great feeling for its domestic side; and the strength of family ties, the regard for housewife ability in the management of an establishment with order and dignity, the minuteness with which gala costumes are remembered, and the feminine delight in their fabrics as well as their effects, the irrepressible fact, the profound respect for the men and women of the elder day, the humane feeling for every one with a weakness or a misfortune—are all recurring traits of the volume. The result is a really charming book of minor memoirs, for it is only of the little things that Mrs. Frémont writes—of what happened every day or at famous social fêtes, of how men looked and what happy passing remarks they made, and all such trivialities, which make up the course of life. There is more than one touching anecdote, or rapid, spirited vignette, or pleasant country scene. Mrs. Frémont has the art of brief narration, apparently, as a gift of nature, and she knows what is the essential and living thing in her memories of the past. The old French Count de la Garde is an admirable figure in drawing and life-likeness, and the sketch of his boyish appeal to Mme. Récamier is done with exceeding simplicity and economy. The old St. Louis nurse, the California Democrat, and the Catholic friends at the Isthmus, to mention no more, are studies that an old hand need not be ashamed of; and Count Bodisco's wedding, Mrs. Madison, the burning of Senator Benton's house (both houses of Congress adjourned at once to rush to the scene), and the visits she made to Jackson in her girlhood, are pictures of Washington life, full of reality, and historic, now that those days and their usages have so utterly passed away. Mrs. Frémont was remarkably well favored by her position; she united in her life the interests and affections and purposes of the different parts of the country, and was a national woman in a true sense—not Virginian, or Western, or Unionist only, but an American. Her associates were the distinguished men of the older and the younger period, and her family interests were those of the nation in a broad sense. Hence the wide range and the historic interest of these 'Souvenirs,' which, however, gain their best attraction from the author's character and the womanly charm so unconsciously exhibited. It is a good book for the girls, to whom much of it is addressed, and for the boys, who have their share of special attention; but older readers will enjoy it also, both for the story's and the writer's sake.

A Nomenclature of Colors for Naturalists, and Compendium of Useful Knowledge for Ornithologists. By Robert Ridgway. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. 1886. 8vo, pp. 129, pll. xvii.

LESS than half of this treatise is devoted to the nomenclature of colors, treated under the heads of principles of color and general remarks, colors required by the zoölogical or botanical artist, and a comparative vocabulary of colors. It is prepared with the best of intentions, for which Mr. Ridgway should have full credit, as he should also for the pains he has taken in this step. But the accomplishment is not here, and the very serious defects of the work leave it little more than an indication of what might have been done. The author is not entirely responsible, perhaps, for such sad typographical errors as that, for example, which appears on page 29, where we are told that a mixture of sepia with French blue and cobalt produces ultramarine blue, or those which hopelessly confound plate 2. The value of the colored plates would have been greatly increased had white slips been attached to each in such manner as to hide from view all but a single one of the parallel columns of color-patches. As these patches stand all in sight at once, the contrasts of these columns of graded colors produce a temporary color-blindness, fatal to the nice discriminations the author seeks to convey to the eye. Again, if there ever was a case for chromotypy, this would seem to be one; yet the patches of color are all rude and irregular hand-painting, most of them mere smirches and daubs. But the idea and the aim of the author are admirable, and his object of establishing a uniform system of color-nomenclature for naturalists may yet be attained by the means he has endeavored to employ.

Part 2 consists of a glossary of technical terms used in descriptive ornithology, and tables for converting the metric system into English inches and conversely. The glossary is much like that furnished by Dr. Coues in Baird, Brewer, and Ridgway's 'History of North American Birds' (1874), but marred by some singularly unhappy definitions. Thus we are told that gymnopædic is "synonymous with ptilopædic," whereas it is just the opposite; homalogonatous is spelled "homologonatous"; a queer word, interrhamal, is said to mean 'between the forks or rhami of the lower jaw,' whence we presume interramal is meant; limicoline is defined as 'shore-inhabiting,' as if it were from limes, a limit, instead of being from limus, mud, as it is.

Probably the most satisfactory execution to be found in the treatise is the delineation of forms on plates 14 16, where such terms as "rhomboid," "quadrate," "ocellate," etc., are prettily illustrated by spots on single feathers.

PUBLISHERS, NEW YORK.

"The blue waters of Massachusetts Bay sparkle through its pages, and the storm-winds are seen whistling across Marblehead harbor, in the quaint old days of the Bay Colony. Bynner has in this romance begun a work for our lovely sea-coast, such as Sir Walter Scott did for the islands and glens of Scotland, covering them with the rich and enduring glamour of poetic association."

HOMŒOPATHY.—EMERSON SAID the mind of J. J. Garth Wilkison had "a very Atlantic roll of thought," and Wilkison wrote of Homœopathy: "The dimensions of power are not weighed by scales, or told off on graduated bottles. . . . I look upon my little bottles as giants that shake great diseases to their marrows and rid the whole man of a foe life-size. Away, then, with bigness based on quantity, and which sits like a vulgar bully in medical shops," etc. This seems to be a very Atlantic breaker roaring on a medical lee shore. All those little bottles, those "giants," decorated with medals and diplomas, may be had at our pharmacies:

JUBILEE EDITION.

THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF THE PICKWICK CLUB.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

New Edition, with Notes and Illustrations.

Edited by Charles Dickens, the Younger.

2 vols., extra crown 8vo, gilt top, $5.

"Will gratify many admirers of the author and the work, and insure the latter a new lease of life. It is fifty years since this unique production of Dickens's genius, and the most popular, first appeared, and hence the name adopted by his son Charles for the present issue. . . . The pictorial scheme is in excellent keeping with the typography on the one hand and the half-century-old atmosphere of the book on the other. Altogether the result is extremely satisfactory, and the new edition will doubtless give point to the English wanderings of many an American tourist hereafter."—Nation.

"It is just such a book as book lovers delight in. Here, at least, is the ideal 'Pickwick.' . . . No edition could be more attractive, none more useful than this one."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A distinct charm is given to this new edition by the illustrations in it of many old English halls, churches, and inns, and of many quaint and ancient streets, long familiar to the imagination through the living power of Charles Dickens's descriptive pen."—Chicago Tribune.

"Messrs. Macmillan, as publishers, and Mr. Charles Dickens, 'the Younger,' as editor, are to be congratulated on their jubilee edition of 'Pickwick' in two volumes. The illustrations are most interesting and give the work a real historical value. . . . As a present for young and old the Jubilee Edition of 'Pickwick' will be very difficult to beat."—Punch.

A JUBILEE BOOK BY MISS YONGE.

The Victorian Half-Century.

By Charlotte M. Yonge, author of 'The Heir of Redclyffe,' 'Cameos from English History,' 'A History of France,' etc. With a New Portrait of the Queen. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 35 cents; cloth binding, 50 cents.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "It is the story of 'peaceful England,' over which Victoria sways her gentle sceptre with motherly care and affection. All the chief events, domestic and public, of the fifty years of the Queen's reign are briefly and clearly set forth in the little book; and as a summary for young people of the Victorian half-century, we do not hesitate in recommending it to parents as a Jubilee present to their children. A good portrait of the Queen gives additional interest to the volume."

A Look Round Literature.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

12mo, cloth, $2.25.

"He surveys the literary field from Æschylus to Tennyson. Mr. Buchanan's pronouncements are, as might be expected, an agreeable mélange of praise and blame. His attitude is that of antagonism to what he deems the 'authorized' criticism of the day. It is gratifying to meet with the critical work of a man at once so enthusiastic and so independent. It would, indeed, have been a pity had Mr. Buchanan not given a permanent form to essays so thoughtful and so stimulating."—London Globe.

A NOTABLE WORK.

AN ADDITION TO

THEODOR MOMMSEN'S HISTORY OF ROME.

The Provinces of the Roman Empire.

From Cæsar to Diocletian. By THEODOR MOMMSEN. Translated, with the Author's Sanction and Additions, by William P. Dickson, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Glasgow. With Ten Maps by Professor Kiepert. 2 vols., 8vo, $6.00.

CONTENTS: The Northern Frontier of Italy—Spain—The Gallic Provinces—Roman Germany and the Free Germans—Britain—The Danubian Lands and the Wars on the Danube—Greek Europe—Asia Minor—The Euphrates Frontier and the Parthians—Syria and the Land of the Nabatæans—Judea and the Jews—Egypt—The African Provinces.

Since the completion of Professor Mommsen's History of the Roman Republic, thirty years ago, the author's researches have made him the master of fresh and valuable facts concerning the subject races of the Empire, and all matters pertaining to the government of the provinces, their internal administration, and their mutual relations, which he now embodies in the present volumes.

ENGLISH REVIEWS:

"The long interval has enabled a history of the Empire to be written far more complete in one sense than could have been produced a generation ago. . . . The details of public and private life, of administration, of religion, of society, of associations, have been recovered to an immense extent by the systematic study and combination of coins and inscriptions. Abundant use is made of such materials in this volume. . . . But the interest will be found little inferior to the solid value. It is a book which no other living scholar could have written."—London Academy.

"Boundless erudition and faultless scholarship are as manifest in this volume as in those that went before it. . . . Students of Mommsen will know that, if the historian's hand has lost none of its cunning, his book will need no eulogy; and assuredly that hand has lost no jot or tittle of its cunning."—St. James's Gazette.

"The book for which the learned world has been waiting for thirty years has come at last. The reader will find almost every point of Rome's foreign policy discussed."—Macmillan's Magazine.

AMERICAN REVIEWS:

"It is the first work, in any language, which gives a perfectly clear, connected account of the vast provincial dependencies of Rome from the time of Cæsar to that of Diocletian. It is a complement to every book hitherto produced about ancient Rome."—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

"It stands next to Gibbon's immortal work. . . . It is a notable historic work."—Chicago Times.

"From these volumes we can gain the most exact conception of the work performed by Rome which we are likely to obtain in the present generation. In a word, this book goes further than any other extant, or now looked for, to provide us with a key to the mediæval history of the Mediterranean world."—N. Y. Sun.

AMERICAN LITERATURE, 1607-1885. By Charles F. Richardson, Professor of English Literature in Dartmouth College. Part 1 (complete in itself). The Development of American Thought. Second edition. Octavo, cloth extra, $3.00.

"I find it admirably adapted to the uses of a class who will take with me, next semester, a course of lectures on the same subject. Prof. Richardson has the gratitude of all teachers of American Literature."—Louise Manning Hodgkins, Professor of English Literature in Wellesley College.

"It is proving to me an instructive and suggestive volume of reference. The author's method of treatment has advantages which I have tested in the work of my department."—S. A. Longwell, Teacher of English and Saxon Literature in Smith College, Northampton, Mass.

"One of the few books on literature in which the historical and logical methods are happily combined."—Prof. T. W. Hunt, Princeton, N. J.

"He has shown a discriminating insight and literary judgment in the treatment of our American literary work."—New Princeton Review.

"The most thoughtful and suggestive work on American literature that has been published."—Boston Globe.

"Nothing approaching it in completeness and broad grasp of the subject has heretofore been produced by any writer."—New York World.

"It is not a mere compilation of facts, but enters into philosophical and critical discussion, and becomes a trustworthy guide to those who would learn what American literature is and what it has achieved. It is itself a most desirable contribution to it."—The Churchman.

"Prof. Richardson's style is always animated, always clear, always forcible, and often brilliant. He has the art of making dull things bright, and there is hardly an uninteresting page in his whole volume."—New York Tribune.

"No class should go out of the American academy or high school that has not had access to this latest, most independent, most enjoyable consideration of the development of American thought."—New England Journal of Education.

"Shows wide and careful study of the theme, a cool judgment, and a steady hand in formulating the results of that judgment. . . . Accurate in information, correct in taste, and eminently simple and interesting in style."—Chicago Times.

"An honest, searching, and dispassionate criticism of American literature, and as such deserves the careful attention of those whose interest is in our national improvement."—Baltimore American.

REPRESENTATIVE ENGLISH PROSE AND PROSE WRITERS. By T. W. Hunt, Professor of English Language in the College of New Jersey. 12mo, $1.50.

In subject matter as in method it is thoughtful and logical, while the English in which it is expressed is clear, vigorous, and tasteful.

FOR MARCH.

"The quality of the New Princeton Review has that fine and rare depth and earnestness which is often wanting in American reviews. As the magazine wins its way it establishes a firm foundation of regard in the thoughtful public. Literature is enriched by its scholarly articles and a thoughtful consideration of social questions encouraged."—Boston Journal.

"The New Princeton Review has scored nearly all the successes of the higher order of periodical literature that have been made in this country since its publication began a year or more ago. The March number is packed solid with articles on different subjects, and there is nothing from cover to cover which one could afford to have omitted."—Boston Herald.

"There has been nothing in the history of American periodical literature more striking and hopeful than the certainty of touch and distinctness in standard shown from the outset by the editors of the New Princeton Review in selecting the ground to be occupied and in carrying out the plan thus formed with marked judgment and unerring taste."—*N. HOMŒOPATHY.—THE BELIEF that nomœopathy is simply infinitesimal doses is an error. Similia similibus curantur (Like cures like) says nothing about the dose, and the small dose is the result of experience, proving that it acts quicker and safer than the large one, provided it be selected on the line of nature's law of similars. But such medicine to be efficacious must be prepared with the utmost care and accuracy, and for this reason buyers should go to old and well-known pharmacies only. Ours was the first established after the introduction of Homœopathy into this country in 1835, and remains the only one whose preparations have been awarded World's fair medals for purity and excellence. WILL PUBLISH SATURDAY:

Agriculture in Some of its Relations with Chemistry.

By F. H. Storer, S.B., A.M., Professor of Agricultural Chemistry in Harvard University. 2 vols., 12mo, $5.00.

This work, the fruit of many years' public instruction in Harvard University, is in no way a technical treatise, nor designed for students of chemistry. From a literary point of view, it ranks with the standard treatise of Mr. Marsh, 'The Earth as Modified by Human Action,' rather than with the professional and learned treatises on Agricultural Chemistry. It is Agriculture rather than Chemistry that forms the subject of the book, and it is the general and universal phases of the subject that are treated rather than any particular operations of the agriculturist. The different topics discussed are very numerous, and refer chiefly to the relations of soil, air, and water to the plant and to each other; tillage, manures and fertilizers, rotation of crops, irrigation, the growth of crops, are fully treated, and there are chapters on the staple crops. The style is clear and straightforward, and the discussion throughout is open to the comprehension of any intelligent reader.

A Child of the Century.

By John T. Wheelwright. 1 vol., 12mo, cloth, $1.00; paper (yellow covers), 50 cents.

This novel is one of the most thoroughly enjoyable that have been published for many a year. It is in every way a story of to-day, of American life and character; not that portentous and ever impending event, "The Great American Novel," but a typical story of political and social life, free from cynicism or morbid realism, and brimming over with good-natured fun which is never vulgar or merely farcical. It is a full-fledged novel, too, with a well-developed plot ending happily and satisfactorily.

A NEW VOLUME IN THE EPOCHS OF MODERN HISTORY.

The Early Tudors.

Henry VII.; Henry VIII. By the Rev. C. E. Moberly, M.A., late a Master in Rugby School. With Four Maps. 1 vol., 16mo, $1.00.

In a clear and concise style the author has given a remarkably interesting account of this most important period of modern history. The political and social condition of Europe at the beginning of the sixteenth century, the civil wars and internal development of England during the reign of Henry VII., the more European policy of his successor, with the alliances and rivalries of Henry VIII., Francis I., and Charles V., the revival of classical learning, and the early Reformation, are all vividly portrayed. This volume fills the interval between 'The Houses of Lancaster and York' and 'The Age of Elizabeth,' of the same series.

EPOCHS OF MODERN HISTORY.

"The volumes contain the ripe results of the studies of men who are authorities in their respective fields."—The Nation.

Beginning of the Middle Ages.—Normans in Europe.—Crusades.—Early Plantagenets.—Edward III.—Houses of Lancaster and York.—Early Tudors.—Age of Elizabeth.—Protestant Revolution.—Thirty Years' War.—Puritan Revolution.—Fall of the Stuarts.—Age of Anne.—Early Hanoverians.—Frederick the Great.—French Revolution.—Epoch of Reform.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1887.

The Week.

It is a long while since there has been a more conspicuous application of the spoils doctrine in our politics than in the substitution by Gov. Lounsbury of a paper-barrel manufacturer for Prof. Arthur T. Hadley as Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics in Connecticut. During his two years' service Mr. Hadley has won a place as an investigator and statistician beside such men as Carroll D. Wright and Francis A. Walker; he has disarmed the not unnatural prejudice of the labor organizations against a college professor; he has rendered not only the State but also the country great service by reports which have taken a high rank in the literature of industrial study. Experience had qualified him to render the public far greater service in the future; and every consideration which would lead a man like Gov. Lounsbury to retain in his private employ a man of demonstrated capacity and fidelity, dictated Mr. Hadley's retention in the service of the State. The Republican party had really by implication committed itself to his reappointment when, in the convention which nominated Mr. Lounsbury, it adopted this resolution: "We demand an honest and thorough enforcement of the Civil Service Law, and as far as practicable we favor the extension of its principles to municipal and State administrations," the most fundamental of these principles being the retention of faithful officials.

Gov. Lounsbury's attempt to explain his extraordinary course only shows how sadly the acceptance of the spoils system may warp the judgment of a man. In the conduct of his private business Mr. Lounsbury probably has no fixed terms of employment, engaging his trusted subordinates upon the usual system, which really amounts to retention during good behavior. If there were, however, regular times for deciding the question whether a man should be reëngaged for another definite period, he would expect the man to rest his claims to such reëngagement solely upon his record. This is precisely the course which Prof. Hadley pursued in his relations with his employer, the State of Connecticut. After remarking that some persons, chiefly protectionist manufacturers, had objected to Prof. Hadley on the ground that he was a free-trader, the Governor says, as though he were adducing a perfectly conclusive reason for his course: "I have not been asked to reappoint Mr. Hadley by a single individual. I have not received a single letter requesting his reappointment. Mr. Hadley himself never mentioned the matter to me. In view of all these facts, I decided that I should not be justified in making a reappointment." In other words, Prof. Hadley, like a self-respecting gentleman, chose to rest his claim to reappointment solely upon his record. He employed no lobbyists to urge his reappointment. He urged no friends to write letters to the Governor in his behalf. (We should not be surprised to learn that he might even have asked his friends to refrain from writing, because he did not wish the element of personal solicitation to enter into the matter.) The newspaper press of the State, as the event has shown, and as he doubtless knew, was almost unanimous in desiring his reappointment, and yet he did not procure, as so easily he might have done, the intervention in his behalf of a single Republican editor. And because he pursued this course, because he preferred his own self-respect as a gentleman to the adoption of the truckling politician's methods, the Governor decided that he "should not be justified in making a reappointment"!

Mr. Edmunds has been interviewed on the subject of the next Presidency, and his remarks will be read with interest in the latitude of Augusta, Me. To the question whether Mr. Cleveland would hold the Republican votes he got before if he should run again (as Mr. Edmunds expects him to do), the Vermont Senator replied: "As between two evils they would vote for him." But he does not expect that it will again be a choice "between two evils" in 1888. Having confidence in the wisdom of the Republican party, he thinks it is "sure to nominate a good man" the next time.

Mr. Wharton Barker, one of Mr. Blaine's stanchest supporters in Pennsylvania, says in last week's American, discussing the Presidency in 1888: "We say frankly, and we know that we are speaking for many Republicans when we say, that it would be a most desperate experiment, in view of the consequences of failure, to renominate Mr. Blaine. He has had his candidacy. He was loyally supported by every element that will have the right or the opportunity to consider the second proposal of his name. That he failed is not their fault, but his misfortune. He cannot justly ask them to enter with him again on so perilous a venture." He intimates, also, that Mr. Blaine, like Mr. Clay in 1844, reached the height of his strength in 1884, and he asks, "Is it possible to increase or even maintain the enthusiasm of his admirers of two years ago? Is it possible to bring him any new elements of support? Is there any quarter in which he is more popular now than in 1884? Is the confidence which he inspires in other public men and party leaders greater?" All these questions he answers in the negative. Of Mr. Barker's suggestion of Sherman and Harrison as substitutes for Blaine, we will now say nothing, except this, that if Mr. Blaine's supporters mean to withdraw him from the field next year, they must do it thoroughly, and without reservation or subterfuge—that is, they must not only relieve the party of Blaine, but of Blaineism. They must not put up somebody who has a secret agreement with Blaine to work under his orders or influence, or to put him into the State Department, so as to enable him to begin over again the old pyrotechnics of 1881. For t must not be forgotten that Blaine's performances as Secretary of State disgusted and alarmed nearly as many Republicans as his financial trickery and falsehood.

Senator Sherman says that "the House of Representatives should have taken the initial step looking to some measure to reduce taxation," and he berates the Democratic party for incapacity because nothing was done. Two conspicuous attempts to "take the initial step" in this direction by considering a tariff bill were made during the Forty-ninth Congress—in the first session on the 17th of June, 1886, and in the second on the 18th of December. On these occasions the two parties divided as follows:

	For Consideration.	Against.
June	156 Dems.	35 Dems.
	4 Reps.	122 Reps.
December	143 Dems.	25 Dems.
	6 Reps.	129 Reps.

It thus appears that on the question of taking the initial step 80 per cent. of the Democrats voted yea the first time, and 86 per cent. the second time; while only 3 per cent. of the Republicans stood on the right side in June, and but 4 per cent. in December. It will puzzle a shrewder politician than Mr. Sherman to convince the public, in the face of such a showing, that it is the Democratic party which should be held responsible for the failure to reduce taxation.

Speaker Carlisle's address to the Boston Democrats at the dinner of the Bay State Club on Saturday, like Senator Hawley's address to the Michigan Republicans at Detroit on Washington's Birthday, was a vigorous plea for State rights. Explicitly disclaiming any belief in secession or nullification, he enforced the necessity of maintaining States' rights in the proper sense against the present tendency toward centralization and a dangerous aggrandizement of the Federal Government. He urged that the Democratic party should reassert its ancient doctrines as to the nature and extent of Federal power. "It believes," he said, "that the Government was created for the people, and that its functions should be confined to the limits prescribed by them." This is the same idea which Mr. Cleveland so forcibly expressed in his Texas Seed Bill veto, that "though the people support the Government, the Government should not support the people." Indeed, Mr. Carlisle's speech throughout was really a response to the position against paternalism which the President assumed in his Seed Bill and Pauper Pension Bill vetoes. Its chief value is as showing that the wisest leaders of the Democratic party recognize that Mr. Cleveland's stand on this vital issue is as popular as it is sound.

The Tennessee Legislature responds quickly and heartily to the President's plea for a revival of the old-time "sturdiness of our national character." Within a week after Congress had adjourned, and the scheme of Federal aid to Southern education had thus lapsed, the lower branch of the Legislature, by a vote of more than five to one, passed a bill, in which the Senate will doubtless concur, increasing the amount of the permanent fund available for school purposes from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000, and so much more than doubling the annual contribution of the State to public education. Tennessee has been growing rapidly in material wealth of late years, and this action of the Legislature shows not only that the State is able to maintain a good school system, but, what is still more important, that she is ready to do it without trying any longer to unload the burden upon the shoulders of the Federal Government. It is an object-lesson in self-reliance and self-help which will not be lost upon other Southern States that have been backward in this matter. The Memphis Appeal does not exaggerate in the slightest degree when it declares that "Tennessee has not done anything in the last twenty-five years that redounds so much to her credit as the passage of this bill."

The refusal of the Missouri Legislature to make any appropriation for the expenses of the militia is beyond question due to the pressure of the labor vote, which was annoyed by the interference of the militia to protect life and property when the Knights were engaged in "war" with the railroad companies and the community in general last year. Of course the labor voters there as elsewhere are a small minority, but they frighten demagogues in the Legislature there as here, by the fact that they are organized and work together at the polls; and they will continue to frighten them until decent people band together in like manner for the punishment at the polls of the demagogues, like Gov. Hill, who pander to them. This is, however, an obvious view. We mention the subject mainly for the purpose of calling attention to the way in which such occurrences as this abolition of the militia in Missouri steadily encourage the growth among us of mercenary troops like Pinkerton's Men. Of course owners of property in Missouri, whether corporations or private individuals, are not going to leave themselves dependent on the city police and the sheriff for protection against "Labor." When threatened, they will promptly call in Pinkerton and garrison their premises in mediæval fashion. Pinkertons, too, will begin to multiply as the demand for private armed force increases, and the discipline and organization of their troops will be improved. It is not impossible that before the end of the century, if Americans do not wake up in the interval, we may see yards and factories protected by bastions armed with light artillery, and pitched battles fought between Scabs and Labor like the fights of the Ghibellines and Guelphs.

The attempt to organize the whole body of those who labor with their hands into a society hostile to all the rest of the community, and, indeed, to the Government and the laws, has been shown very clearly by the events of the past year to be a failure. Even Henry George begins to see this, and has the courage to say so. The notion that a large strike is more formidable than a small one has been thoroughly exploded. But the fact still remains that not only the Knights of Labor, but nearly all the trade-unions, are managed on the theory that employers are necessarily the enemies of the laboring man, and that capitalists—meaning people who have saved money and hold it as a fund for the employment of labor—are enemies of society and to be treated as such; that is, discouraged, denounced, and legislated against. This is not all, however, nor the worst. They are all, or nearly all, managed as military organizations; that is, ruled despotically by a few officers, whose word of command overrides the individual judgment of the members, not only about the general policy or utterances of the organization, but about each man's personal interests and those of his family. A very large proportion, the larger part, in fact, of the workingmen of this country, see all this as plainly as anybody and do not belong to the unions. But their position outside the unions is, as Mr. Hewitt has said, a "pitiable" one. Being unorganized, they have to stand alone, not only as against their employers, but as against the unions, which persecute them remorselessly, hunting them from town to town and shop to shop, as if they were wild animals, with a pitilessness and cruelty such as neither king nor capitalist would in our day venture to display towards any human being.

We are glad to say that a movement for the organization of the non-union men has at last been begun. The non-union printers have started an organization, which is intended to give those who do not care to surrender their individual judgment in the control of their lives, all the benefits in the way of assistance and protection which the unions now give their members, without robbing them of their freedom, and without placing them in an attitude of hostility to the rest of the community. It leaves its members, in short, part and parcel of the American business community—dependent, as editors, lawyers, and merchants are, for success and respect, in their callings, on integrity, and capacity, and independence, but shielded, as far as mutual help and coöperation can go, against all misfortunes not brought about by misconduct. It leaves every man to rely on honesty, diligence, and fair dealing for his standing in his calling, and discards such questionable practices of the old unions as striking without cause or without discussion, or waiting until the employer is in some pinch or necessity, and then stopping his business in such manner as to do him the greatest possible amount of damage, as if he were a criminal or outlaw. It proposes, in short, to place the workingman on a footing of business equality with the capitalist, with common aims and aspirations, and it recognizes the undoubted fact that no employer who is fit to carry on a business of any kind, is ever likely to resist the reasonable and fairly presented demands of a body of workmen whose intelligence, and reliableness, and capacity make them valuable to him. The new organization is called the Printers' Protective Fraternity.

Cardinal Gibbons, if correctly reported, has been partaking freely of the labor beverage, and appears to be as much under its influence as Gov. Hill. His report to the Propaganda on the view to be taken of the organization by the Church, which was published a fortnight ago, was, as far as literary form goes, a far better document than Gov. Hill could produce, but the reasoning was in all respects worthy of the Governor when his head is stuck deepest in the sand, and shows that "politics" sustained a terrible loss when the Cardinal entered the Church. He has since been reported as having announced himself "the enemy of plutocracy and of soulless corporations and men," as indeed we all are. But he adds, also, that the Catholic Church is "in this instance" (the case of the Knights) "going to take the side of the weaker against the stronger," which is also a blessed announcement, but, in the Cardinal's mouth, needs explanation. We hope that it means—but should like to be assured that it does—that the Cardinal himself is in this country going to take the side of the "scabs" against the Knights of Labor, which is, towards those laborers who do not belong to it, the most "soulless corporation" in existence.

The Cardinal, as a good Catholic, must surely intend, when he gets back, to assert the right of the individual poor man to regulate his own life in his own way, and especially his right to belong or not to belong to societies or organizations, and to sell his labor on his own terms to customers of his own choosing. By "the weaker" he must surely mean that vast body of laborers—the majority—who, because they do not wish to join the Knights or other associations, are, as Mr. Hewitt has well said, "called opprobrious names, hunted from shop to shop, denied employment on the fearful penalty of stopping all work, however pressing or important." This is not all, however. Mr. Hewitt might have added that they have often to follow their callings under the protection of an armed guard, are often afraid to return to their homes at night lest they should be murdered or maimed on the way; are often fired at with pistols, struck down with slung-shots, beaten with bludgeons, and denied food at the stores, simply for exercising the simplest of an American citizen's rights. The men who carry on this atrocious persecution, or encourage it, or wink at it, or say it cannot be helped, are the Knights of Labor, and notably such eminent Christians as Powderly, Turner, Quinn, and others, and that eminent philanthropist and philosopher, Henry George. We take it for granted the Cardinal has not heard of all this, and that when he does he will let loose some of his ecclesiastical thunder on those oppressors of the poor, the soulless ruffians who have been humbugging him into supporting at Rome the claims of one of the most anti-social and despotic organizations ever set up, to be petted and fostered by the Vicar of Jesus Christ.

We can vouch for the correctness of the following statement of the real features of the Sully-Garrett deal. Sully agreed to buy and Garrett agreed to sell 80,000 shares of Baltimore and Ohio stock at 200—that is, for the total sum of $16,000,000, payable as follows: $1,000,000 on Thursday last, 10th inst., $5,000,000 additional in forty-five days thereafter, $10,000,000 more in one year from the date of the contract. The contract further gave Sully the right to make the whole of the stock the basis of an issue of $10,000,000 collateral-trust debentures. In this very feature lay the impracticability of the scheme, for the creation of such a trust would leave the first six millions to be paid entirely "in the air." Mr. Garrett did not bind himself to put any of the stock in escrow, thus leaving the question an open one whether he would have been able to deliver the whole amount conditionally sold. For a long time negotiations have been carried on between Mr. Garrett and other parties than the Sully combination for the purchase of his interest in the Baltimore and Ohio stock. We have reason to think that these negotiations are far more likely to result in the accomplishment of their object than the collapsed other "deal."

The decision handed down by the Supreme Court a few days ago, whereby the "drummers' tax" levied on salesmen from other States by the "Taxing District of Shelby County, Tenn." (in other words, the city of Memphis), was declared to be unconstitutional, will deprive several States of considerable revenue. In an argument made last year before the House Committee of Commerce, counsel for the Traders' and Travellers' Union pointed out that fourteen States and Territories and the District of Columbia levy this tax in some form. Among them are Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Alabama, Louisiana, Texas, and Colorado. The Richmond State says that the revenues of Virginia will be diminished by not less than $50,000; the revenues of North Carolina will fall off quite as much, and the loss will not be smaller, perhaps, in any of these States which had built a protective barrier against the "commercial missionary." Some of them levy a tax on salesmen whether they solicit orders for houses within or without the State; but since the Supreme Court has declared the tax on those who live outside the State unconstitutional, because it is an interference with the freedom of inter-State commerce over which Congress has exclusive control, the present taxes on "home drummers" are sure to be repealed by the next Legislatures of all these States. This decision makes unnecessary the bill introduced in Congress by Mr. Darwin R. James, which prohibits the levying of any such tax by any State on salesmen from other States.

The decision will have—at least it ought to have—a good effect on commercial morals that will do more than make up for the loss of revenue. These taxes were so generally evaded that in many communities it had become a point of honor among travelling salesmen not to pay them. At this evasion their customers winked, and not infrequently both drummer and customer profited privately by it. A premium was put on commercial dishonesty. The Traders' Union published the statement last year that 7,000 drummers visited Washington in 1885, and that instead of the $1,400,000 which the District of Columbia would have received if its $200 license fee had been paid by every one, it received only $10,000. "It may be pertinent," they remarked, "to inquire what became of the $1,390,000 not accounted for?" There is no reason to believe that the treasury of any State or Territory received a much larger proportion than this of the revenue that its law contemplated, and it is certain that this kind of "protection" did not protect anybody or encourage respect for the laws in general. Financially and morally it was very like protection on a larger scale.

If any of the women of this State feel downhearted over the defeat of the Municipal Woman-Suffrage Bill at Albany, they may find some consolation in a report just made by the Secretary of State of Massachusetts on the practical operation of the law of that State allowing women to vote at elections for school committees. This law has been in operation long enough to test the question how eager women are for the ballot, and the statistics are as follows: In 1881, 3,349 women qualified themselves to vote by registering, but of these only 1,571 went to the polls. In 1882, 2,951 women registered and 1,346 voted. The registration in 1883 was 3,138, and the vote 1,469; in 1884 the registration was 3,778, and the vote 1,896; in 1885 the registration was 5,260, and the vote 3,227; and in 1886 the registration was 4,219, and the vote 1,911. Thus in the six years the average number registered was 3,782, and the average vote was 1,903. Placing the average male vote of Massachusetts at 300,000, the total female vote should be 337,500, as the female population of the State exceeds the male by about 66,000. Therefore, we find that the eagerness of the female part of the population of Massachusetts for the ballot is measured by the fact that one woman in every 176 votes when she is allowed to. There is one point, however, brought out in these statistics which deserves consideration. While only one woman in 176 votes when she can, one in every 80 takes advantage of the opportunity to register. Perhaps, now, the female suffragists have made the mistake of demanding the ballot, when what the political female heart is longing for is to put her name on the registry list.

The Salisbury Ministry seem to be floundering from one difficulty into another in their dealings with the Irish question, and each one seems greater than the last. They have secured the promise of 70 votes from the Unionists in support of a measure of coercion, which is to consist simply of an enlargement of the summary powers of the local magistrates. Of Hartington they are tolerably sure to the end, as he looks at the whole Irish problem, land question and all, from the point of view of the heir to a great dukedom. The hold they have on Chamberlain and on the rank and file of the Unionists is of a different kind. These men calculate that if, by supporting the Tories pretty steadily, they can keep them in power during the present Parliament—say five years—they will before the next general election have got rid of Gladstone by death or infirmity. They feel very confident that no other Liberal will be able to keep home rule before the voters as a burning question, and they will thus be able bye-and-bye to step back into the Liberal ranks themselves without fear or reproach. This policy may work very well if nothing occurs to excite public opinion against the Ministry to a point which would frighten the main body of Unionists and lead to desertions. But things are daily occurring which make this contingency seem very probable.

As was expected, Bismarck's victory in the late electoral contest has had a tranquillizing effect upon European international politics. He has proved to France that he has all Germany, practically undivided, behind him, and that he will be prepared for every emergency. During the Parliamentary debates which preceded the election he had repeatedly assured France, and all Europe, that he was not going to be the attacking party "under any circumstances," and his conduct after the triumph is in evident harmony with that assurance. The reasonableness of the determination was, in fact, so patent, considering the general military and political situation, that only blind hatred could doubt its sincerity. The cry which some weeks ago went through France and Russia, and was re'echoed in other countries, that the republic was going to be invaded, is now almost completely hushed, and France is so delighted with the triumphant manifestation of French patriotism by the electoral constituencies of Alsace-Lorraine, that she quietly enjoys the cheering prospect of immunity from aggression, and waits for Russia to begin the attack on Germany.

This temporizing disposition of France keeps the sword of Russia in the scabbard, while to render Russian aggression a still more hazardous task, and the consummation of a Franco-Russian alliance an attempt of most questionable utility, the German Chancellor has tightened the bonds of the formerly indefinite alliance created by himself between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy. A formal triple alliance, mutually guaranteeing the present possessions of the contracting Powers, is now positively asserted to have been concluded at the beginning of this month for three years. And it also appears from various indications that Rumania, hitherto wavering between two opposite tendencies—the desire to insure her security from the overwhelming pressure of the Russian neighbor, and the equally strong desire to wrest from Austria-Hungary, with the help of Russia, extensive districts mainly inhabited by Rumans—has finally decided on casting her lot with the Central European coalition. The King of Servia is more than an ally, he is almost a vassal, of the Hapsburg Emperor, who secures his throne against the pretenders of the House of Karageorge, now related by marriage to the Prince of Montenegro, the only faithful friend of the Czar in the Balkan Peninsula. The Sultan himself was nearly won over by skilful diplomacy to the Russian side in the great imbroglio, but he, too, has apparently been driven from it by the fear of having to contend both with Bismarck's coalition and the power of Great Britain. Russia thus remains isolated, with only France as a prospective ally. But she has a population of a hundred millions, a tremendous engine in autocracy, an undying fanaticism, and an unbounded faith in her Slavic destiny; and passion goads her on,

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

WEDNESDAY, March 9, to TUESDAY, March 15, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC

THE bill providing support for the militia of the State of Missouri was defeated in the Legislature on March 9, and the companies theretofore organized have disbanded, or will disband. The failure of the bill is reported to be the result of the opposition of the labor organizations.

The lower house of the Tennessee Legislature has passed a bill to increase the permanent school fund of the State from $2,000,000 to $5,000 000, which, at six per cent. interest, will yield nearly $300,000, or $180,000 more than the present fund yields.

The Legislature of California has passed a "Pure-Wine Bill," which prohibits the manufacture of impure wine, and requires every wine-maker and bottler in the State to affix his name to all his bottles and casks. A label for every bottle or cask must be procured from the State Comptroller. But the law is not a revenue measure, for the State charges for the labels a price that covers only the expense of printing and distributing them.

More than 1,000 women at Leavenworth, Kan., have registered and will cast their votes, as allowed by the recently enacted law which grants municipal suffrage to women.

In the New York Assembly on March 15 the High-License Bill, which fixes the tax for selling spirituous liquors at $1,000, was ordered to a third reading by a vote of 65 to 51. All the yeas were Republicans. This insures the passage of the measure.

The Congressional Apportionment Committee of the lower house of the Pennsylvania Legislature has agreed on such a redistricting of the city of Philadelphia as, it is thought, will prevent the election of any Democratic Congressman from that city. This action is significant because it may "shut out" Mr. Randall.

The Florida State Colored Fair was opened at Jacksonville on March 15. The total value of the exhibits is not less than $400,000, and among them are drawings, maps, and other handiwork of the colored pupils of Florida schools. There is a big display of preserved fruits and cereals, and of fancy work, silk wraps, dresses, and the like.

Texas cattlemen have decided to build a large refrigerator canning and packing establishment at Houston, which will make Houston the most important cattle market in the South. Arrangements have already been made for the transportation of the beef to England.

The loss of cattle in Montana Territory this winter is thought already to be not less than 30 per cent., and many more will die before the snow entirely disappears. For two months the stock in many places has been almost without food and exposed to intense cold. The thermometer has been as low as 57 degrees below zero in Northern Montana. For the first ten days in February the average was 20 below. This extreme temperature, and the lack of grass, and hard-crusted snow two feet deep, have caused the death of even the hardiest animals. Sheep-raisers are suffering to almost the same extent as the cattlemen. The consequent financial depression extending to many branches of trade will be felt for the whole year. Stock-raising on the "rustling" plan, that is, by trusting to favorable weather on the ranches, it is reported, will not be extensively tried another season. The winter ranch, it is thought, will give way to the stock-farm.

Great destitution has been caused among the Cheyenne Indians in Montana because the snow has cut them off from the Government's supplies.

Many plantations below Vicksburg have been inundated by the overflow of the Mississippi River.

A company has been formed with $5,000,000 capital, it is reported, which will build cotton-seed oil mills in most of the Southern centres of trade.

The strike of the railroad employees at Pittsburgh and west of that city has caused a serious blockade of freight at Youngstown, O., but the strike has been discountenanced by the leaders of the labor organizations, and no further trouble is anticipated. Five hundred laborers on a railroad near Marquette, Mich., who struck for higher wages, were prevented by officers of the law from doing violence to new employees, and the work which was suspended for a few days has been resumed.

Great excitement was caused in railroad circles on March 9 and for several days following by the rumor that the control of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company had passed into the hands of a syndicate which would thereby become controllers of one of the most extensive railway systems in the world, extending from New York almost to the uttermost parts of the South and far into the West, and including the Central Railroad of New Jersey, the Philadelphia and Reading system, the Richmond Terminal and Richmond and Danville lines, the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia lines, the Central Railroad of Georgia, and the Baltimore and Ohio, making not less than 16,000 miles of track. This great consolidation has not been made, but there is yet expectation that some modification of it will be consummated.

On April 13 the centenary of the reorganization of Columbia College will be celebrated.

On March 9 the Board of Trustees of Cornell University elected a Law Faculty, consisting of Judge Douglas Boardman of the Supreme Court of New York, who will be Dean of the school; Prof. H. B. Hutchins of the Law School of the University of Michigan, Professor of the Law of Real and Personal Property and of Equity, and Charles A. Collin of Elmira, N. Y. In addition to these resident members of the Faculty, Judge Francis M. Finch of the Court of Appeals, Daniel H. Chamberlain of New York, William F. Coggswell of Buffalo, and Theodore Bacon of Rochester, were elected non-resident lecturers. Prof. Herbert Tuttle was elected Professor of English Constitutional Law and International Law, to lecture both in the Law School and in the School of History and Political Science. At a subsequent meeting the Executive Committee of the Board of Trustees appointed Francis M. Burdick of Hamilton College Associate Professor of Law.

A statue of Gen. Garfield will be unveiled in the circle at the junction of Maryland Avenue and First Street, Washington, on April 12.

The warden and engineer of the Cook County (Ill.) Hospital (in Chicago), the warden of the insane asylum, and a bookkeeper of a firm of contractors who have done work for the county, have been indicted by a Special Grand Jury for conspiracy to defraud the county.

The American yachts the Dauntless and the Coronet set sail from Sandy Hook on March 12, for a transatlantic race to Queenstown for a wager of $10,000 a side.

On the morning of March 14 a suburban train from Dedham, Mass., bound for Boston, on the Dedham branch of the Boston and Providence Railroad, fell through an iron girder bridge between Roslindale and Forest Hills, a station about six miles from Boston. The train comprised nine passenger coaches, six of which were thrown in the gap below, causing an appalling loss of life and limb. As many as 30 persons were killed and 100 injured. All the passengers were persons who lived in the suburbs of Boston or in the city itself.

Many thousands of people viewed the remains of Henry Ward Beecher in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on March 11. The funeral was preached by the Rev. Charles H. Hall, and funeral services were held in several other churches, and the business houses in Brooklyn were closed during the greater part of the day. Mr. Beecher was buried in Greenwood Cemetery on March 12.

James B. Eads, the engineer of the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, and of the Mississippi River levees, and the designer of a ship-railway across the Central American isthmus, died at Nassau on March 8. Eben F. Pillsbury died at Melrose, Mass, on March 12. He was until within a few years a resident of Augusta, Me., and was a prominent lawyer and Democratic politician in that State. He was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue for the Eastern District of Massachusetts by President Cleveland, but the Senate refused to confirm him.

FOREIGN.

On March 13, the anniversary of the assassination of Alexander II., an attempt was reported to have been made to take the life of the Czar. Persons with explosives in their possession were arrested in St. Petersburg on the route he was to have taken to attend a service held in commemoration of his father. The strongest confirmation of the seriousness of the plot is that the Czar again retired to his secluded residence at Gatchina, which he occupied during the first months of his reign. A report has been published at Vienna that a well-organized plot has been discovered to overthrow the Government of Russia, and to establish a limited constitutional government. This, however, lacks confirmation. The Imperial Court of St. Petersburg attended a funeral service before the tomb of Alexander II. in the Cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul. Services were held in all the churches and at the shrine over the spot where he was killed. In the evening the city was illuminated in honor of the accession of Alexander III. The Czar on his forty-second birthday (March 10) received cordial telegrams from the King of Italy, the Emperor of Austria, and the Prince of Montenegro. The Emperor and Empress of Germany gave a gala dinner in his honor, at which Gen. von Moltke, Count Herbert Bismarck, all the members of the Russian Embassy, and many other distinguished persons were present.

Definite information was published on March 15 at London and Vienna that while the Czar was returning from the requiem services a bomb attached to a cord was thrown under his carriage. The intention was to tighten the string, which was connected with the mechanism, and thus explode the bomb; but, before it could be executed, the student who threw it and a suspected accomplice were seized. It was found that they lived together in a lodging-house in a suburb of the city. The police visited this house and discovered there a quantity of explosives and a number of revolutionary pamphlets. More than 200 persons have been arrested. The bomb was shaped like a book, so that it could be carried in the hand without exciting suspicion.

The persons arrested in connection with the constitutional plot indignantly deny that they are in any way connected with the effort to take the Czar's life. Their motto, they say, is "The people; with the Czar or against the Czar." They have published a lithographic periodical composed mainly of extracts from the works of notable writers on constitutional law and political economy. The statutes of the Society obliged all the members to join, at the signal of their chief, in doing their utmost to subvert the existing Government and establish a constitutional government. It is reported that the conspiracy of Russian land-owners and tradesmen to overthrow the Czar's Government was very extensive, and included a number of military officers, and that it was chiefly on this ground that the Czar was averse to undertaking war.

The plot against the life of the Czar has had a tendency to revive talk of war. The Berlin Post on March 16 said: "With terror and regret we say that Europe must prepare to see Russia adopt a policy of despair, taking shape either in fatalistic resignation or frantic adventures. The latter is the more probable. It will require a superhuman effort on the part of the Czar to oppose the tempest of voices calling for war as a remedy for Russia's woes."

Two more of the leaders in the recent insurrection in Bulgaria have been sentenced to death, and 125 other participants in the revolt have been sentenced to prison. Conflicting reports have come of thwarted plots of insurgents, but there has been no other outbreak. The Regents have decided to summon the Great Sobranye and submit to it reports of the recent trouble, and to ask either that a supreme power for the government of the country be formed or that the present régime be confirmed.

It has been reported that the German police have discovered a great Anarchist conspiracy extending throughout Germany, Switzerland, Russia, and America. But no definite facts about it have been made known and no action taken, except to disband certain suspicious societies in Alsace-Lorraine.

During the discussion of the budget in the Provincial Committee of Alsace Lorraine, a Deputy, speaking for the Government, said, on March 15, that the spirit which the late elections had shown, induced the Government to resort to measures to protect the province from illegal agitation. The Government was convinced that the time had arrived when it was necessary to adopt measures more severe than it had wished to adopt to weld the province in closer cohesion with the rest of Germany.

Great preparations are making for the celebration of the ninetieth birthday of the Emperor of Germany on March 22. The King and Queen of Saxony, the Crown Prince of Würtemberg, the Princes of the Houses of Baden and Hohenzollern, Prince Louis of Bavaria, and the Dukes of Saxe-Coburg and Saxe-Meiningen are going to Berlin to take part in the festivities. It is reported that eighty members of royal families will be present on that occasion. The Prince of Wales is expected on the 20th and will remain a week. The Crown Prince of Denmark and the Crown Prince of Sweden and Norway are also expected. Prince von Hohenlohe, Governor of Alsace-Lorraine, has ordered a grand celebration of the day, the festivities to include military reviews and other pageants. The Czar will send the Grand Duke Vladimir and the Grand Duke Michael, with a large suite, to Berlin; and Nizami Pasha will represent the Sultan of Turkey.

Paragraph 1 of the Septennate Army Bill, which passed its final reading by a vote of 227 to 31 (84 members not voting) in the Reichstag on March 11, fixes the peace effective force of the German Empire from April 1, 1887, to March 31, 1894, at 468,400 men, exclusive of one-year volunteers. Paragraph 2 fixes the infantry at 534 battalions, the cavalry at 465 squadrons, the field artillery at 364 batteries, the foot artillery at 31 battalions, the pioneers at 19 battalions, and the trainmen at 18 battalions.

The passage of the Septennate Bill in the German Reichstag and the quiet that followed the insurrection in Bulgaria gave a peaceful tone to European news for a week. But it is now reported that 10,000 men are engaged night and day in fortifying Cracow. Austria has made great though late preparations for war, and Germany is prepared to start a campaign on a day's notice. The army contracts are signed, the officers have sealed marching orders, and the expectation of war is yet general in both Austria and Germany.

The fourth son of Prince William, son of the Crown Prince of Germany, was bapuized at Potsdam on March 12. The Emperor was present and held the infant at the font during the baptism.

M. de Lesseps has made a visit to Berlin, which it has been suspected and denied was of political significance. On March 9 he was the guest of Emperor William at supper, and both the Emperor and the Empress bestowed upon him marked attentions. His effort to secure the neutrality of the Suez Canal is reported to have been amicably but evasively received by Prince Bismarck.

Russian admirers of the French Gen. Boulanger have presented to him a valuable sword.

By an accidental explosion of mélinite, a new explosive, in the French Arsenal at Belfort on March 10, six men were killed and eleven injured.

An important incident of political discussion in Great Britain was a speech by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain on March 9, in which, speaking for the Liberal-Unionists, he declared that groundless hopes had been raised among the Gladstonian Liberals, who were mistaken in throwing up their hats before they were out of the woods, and that the difficulties in the way of a union of all factions of the Liberal party were greater than ever. The Liberal-Unionists, he said, would never surrender an inch of their demand that the Imperial Parliament should retain its supremacy with members from every section of the United Kingdom within its walls. The central authority at Dublin must be subordinate to Parliament and not coördinate. They would never consent to surrender the Irish Protestant counties to the control of a Dublin Parliament against the will of the citizens of those counties. He congratulated the Liberal-Unionists on the fact that they remained in fighting trim.

Mr. Gladstone on March 10 gave notice to the Liberal party that he himself would lead the opposition to the Coercion Bill in Parliament.

Mr. Gladstone, replying to the request of a number of his adherents for information as to the coacessions offered to the Unionists, has said that the Liberals may rely upon his firm adherence to the principles and bases of his home-rule policy. The Radical Unionists attribute the failure of the conference negotiations to Mr. Gladstone's decision to abide by Mr. Parnell's demands. Since the breaking off of negotiations with the Gladstonian Liberals, the demands of the Unionists have grown. As formulated they comprise the following essentials: That Ireland be represented in the Imperial Parliament; that Ulster be separated from the jurisdiction of the Dublin Parliament; that the Irish Parliament be subordinate to and not coördinate with the imperial body; that the subordinate powers of the Irish Parliament be strictly defined and limited; that the maintenance of law and order remain under the control of the imperial authority; that Mr. Gladstone's financial proposals be abandoned; that his proposition that the Irish Parliament be composed of two orders be abandoned, and that British credit be not pledged for the benefit of Irish landlords. The Parnellites and Gladstonians scout these demands as unworthy of consideration.

A sensation was caused in British politics by the publication of Gen. Sir Redvers Buller's evidence before the Irish Land Commission. The drift of his testimony was that it would be a serious matter, with their grievances unredressed, to attempt to suppress by force the tenants' right openly to associate for the protection of their interests. This testimony was so reported as to take much of its force away, and it was said that the important part of it was suppressed. That any part of it was suppressed was promptly denied, but that this testimony was embarrassing to the Government has not been denied. On nearly every one of the thousand pages of the blue book is evidence favorable to a suspension of evictions and to Gen. Buller's plan of legal machinery between tenant and landlord. The testimony for coercion occupies about one twentieth of the space, the remaining being for legislation.

The Prince of Wales presided on March 11 at the annual meeting of the Royal Thames Yacht Club. The money for the 1,000-guinea jubilee prize has already been subscribed, and the 14th of June has been fixed as the date for starting the race. The course laid out is from the Nore northward up the east coast of England, around Scotland and Ireland to Dover.

At the Papal Consistory on March 14 the Pope announced that Monsignor di Rende, Papal Nuncio at Paris; Rampolla del Tindaro, Nuncio at Madrid; Vannutelli, Nuncio at Vienna; Masela, ex-Nuncio at Lisbon; and Bishop Gordani of Ferrara, had been created Cardinals. He also announced the appointment of eight Italian, two Spanish, one Portuguese, and three East Indian Bishops.

The Pope has asked Cardinal Manning for his opinion on capital and labor, and will await a reply before writing his encyclical. Cardinal Gibbons, who is now in Rome, has been reported as saying that there would be no conflict in the United States between the Catholic Church and the Knights of Labor.

An earthquake shock was felt on March 11 throughout the region of the late disturbance. At Mentone it was the most violent since that of February 23. The walls of many houses were again cracked, and mirrors and glassware were broken. Visitors hurried away, and residents camped out in the open air. At Monte Carlo the shock caused a panic in the gambling rooms. The vibration was felt sharply in Marseilles, where for a time there was a panic. The hotels and the Bourse were emptied in a very few seconds. The walls of many buildings were cracked.

Mr. Walker Fearn, United States Consul-General to Greece, on March 14 opened the new building erected by the American Society at Athens for the study of classical archæology. Mr. Fearn and the principal of the Society thanked the Government for the gift of the site.

News has been received at Zanzibar from Emin Bay. In November he went to Uganda, but permission was refused him to go through the country. Advices from Uganda, dated January 24, say that Dr. Junker's caravan reached Emin Bey safely, and that he was well.

The members of the House of Commons of the Canadian Parliament recently elected are divided as follows: Ministerialists 112, Opposition 95, with 8 members from disputed districts not reckoned.

The Canadian Government has forwarded a proposition to the Colonial Office in London concerning the fisheries dispute with the United States, wherein it is suggested that Great Britain should at once propose to the United States the settlement of all questions without reserve by the appointment of a commission to consist as follows: One delegate to be named by the Governor and Council of Canada, one from Newfoundland, by and with the consent of Great Britain; two from the United States, and one from some independent European Power. With such a Commission, it is said, all questions could be satisfactorily adjusted. It is understood that Germany is the Power which Canada would prefer as referee.

The Canadian protective fleet in the fishing waters this year will be larger than that of last year, and "the Yankee smack that succeeds in trespassing within the three-mile limit without molestation," Sir John McDonald is quoted as saying, "will have to be commanded by an uncommonly cunning old sea dog."

THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA VS. THE ANTHRACITE COAL COMPANIES.

TOWARD the end of last summer the Governor of Pennsylvania let it be known that he had discovered a corrupt agreement between the companies engaged in carrying anthracite coal, and that he had determined to exert the whole power of the State to break it up. As every one who read the newspapers knew that the "coal pool" had been in existence for nearly two years, and as there seemed to be no reason for supposing that there was any more corruption in it than in other pools, the public listened to this announcement with chilling indifference. It was suggested that the Governor's action was caused by the approach of the fall election, and the feeling that something ought to be done to rescue his Administration from impending oblivion. He had been elected as a reform Governor, but he had instituted no reforms, and his course from the beginning had been a disappointing one.

Such suggestions as these called forth vigorous protestations of good faith from Gov. Pattison; but the report of the proceedings in the suit that he caused to be instituted against the coal companies precludes belief in these protestations. A more humiliating failure on the part of a plaintiff is inconceivable. To be sure, the suit was begun too near election time to advance very far before a change of administration occurred, but the witnesses called by the State heaped up such a mass of evidence against it that no subsequent proceedings could make much difference with the result. That must be a weak case for the plaintiff in which he relies upon the defendant for his evidence; but, with one exception, all the witnesses called by the Attorney-General were officers or agents of the defendant companies. That exception was in the case of an officer of the State Bureau of Industrial Statistics, and his testimony was more damaging to the case of the State than was that of the defendants themselves. The State had charged that the companies had restricted production during the year 1885. The Attorney-General succeeded in establishing out of the mouth of his own witness that this charge was false, and that, in fact, the production of that year had increased by 6,000,000 tons. The palpable absurdity of these figures would have discredited the defendants' case had they introduced them; when brought out by the plaintiff they turned the whole proceeding into a farce.

That the way of the demagogue is hard was curiously illustrated by another circumstance that appeared upon this investigation. The miners are now generally paid upon a "sliding scale"—their wages rising with the price of coal—and their pay constitutes from five-sixths to six-sevenths of the cost of production. If, then, the companies had succeeded in raising the price of coal, they would have conferred a benefit upon "labor." In some communities it might be urged that the interests of the great mass of laborers who consume coal were of more consequence than those of the small number who produce it. But this argument has always been regarded as fallacious in Pennsylvania, and is, moreover, hostile to the "labor" policy. Gov. Pattison, therefore, found himself in the awkward position of denouncing the employers of about 100,000 laborers, most of them voters, and Democratic voters at that, for adopting a policy that would raise their wages and lessen their hours of work.

For these reasons the attack upon the coal companies must be pronounced a failure; but the testimony taken in the suit is in some respects of real value. It illustrates several important economic laws. The production of anthracite coal is substantially a monopoly. This is not so much due to an agreement among producers as to an agreement among the carriers, who are much fewer in number than the producers, and upon whom the producers are dependent. Monopolies have an odious name; but it is often the case that their interests are the same as those of the public. It may be questioned whether the great coal companies have in the past been governed by this principle, but the circumstances of the present time have compelled them to act in accordance with it. They have been ground between the upper millstone of the competition of the producers of bituminous coal and the nether millstone of the unions of miners, with the result that they have to treat all parties fairly. In fact, it seems to be their stockholders, and not the public, who have now most cause to complain.

Thus it appears that in the case of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company the price of coal was lower in 1886—under the alleged corrupt combination—than in any year since the war, and lower than the average of any previous year except 1879. This price, moreover, was very little above the cost of production, nearer to it, in fact, than in 1879, on account of the advance in wages. The profit made by this company, whose coals are exceptionally valuable, was in 1886 only 15 cents a ton, without allowing for royalties, interest, or depreciation of improvements. As the surface seams of coal are exhausted, it becomes necessary to use expensive hoisting machinery, and the cost of keeping the collieries free from water steadily increases. As the coal is taken out more thoroughly, more timber is used, and the price of timber has itself advanced. Greater care also has to be taken in preparing coal for market, for people have grown fastidious.

The fluctuations in price that regularly take place during the year, and the variations in the amounts produced from month to month, are not so arbitrary as the public suppose. They are caused by a very simple physical fact—the bulky character of the commodity compared with its value. The expense of storing coal is so great where land is valuable that large consumers prefer not to buy it until they need it. Furthermore, the expense per ton of rehandling it when it is stored by the companies is more than the average profit. The cheapest place for storing coal is the mine. The economical management of the business, therefore, requires that when the coal is once moved, it should be kept steadily in motion until it reaches the consumer. Hence it becomes necessary not only to reduce production when the demand is slack, but to lower the price at the same time. Were this not done, the cost of production would be greater and the average price higher, while the miners would be idle for months at a time. Were the production to be the same in every month, the companies would at one time be overloaded with their own products, for they have not storage room for more than a million tons, while at another they could not supply the demand. Formerly, when there was no "pool," the fluctuations of price were much more violent, the periods when the miners were idle were much longer, and the expense of doing the business was much greater.

Upon the whole, it seems that the "coal pool" has been the result of an economic necessity, and produces an economic gain. The companies were charged with entering into a conspiracy to restrict the production of coal, to raise its price, and to lower the wages of miners. The evidence so far brought forward in support of these charges shows that, whatever the purpose of the "conspiracy" may have been, it has been attended with an increase of production, a reduction of profit to the producers, a reduction of price to the consumers, and an increase of wages to the miners. There is no reason to suppose that this state of affairs will be bettered by the interference of the State.

MONEY AND POLITICAL MACHINES.

MR. WILLIAM M. IVINS has published in the Evening Post two more papers, in which he follows up the growth of the evils so forcibly pointed out in his paper before the Commonwealth Club, and indicates the remedy for them. His new revelations, while not so startling as those in the first paper, are scarcely less interesting. Mr. Ivins shows that we owe the demoralizing practice of heavy assessments to the fertile political genius of John Kelly. Nothing affords stronger evidence of the merits of the invention, from a political point of view, than the broad general results which it accomplished within the short period of a dozen years. The grand total of "assessments" was run up from a few thousand dollars in 1872 to nearly a quarter of a million in 1884. Three political Machines were built up, controlling on election day an aggregate force of 45,000 men, equal to one fifth of the entire voting population, all of whom were under pay and who had a pecuniary interest in the outcome of the election. The total amount of money distributed among these 45,000 on election day was over $700,000. They had at stake in the election at least $1,000,000 more in salaries, which their leaders hoped to get from the city for themselves and as many of their followers as could be quartered upon the city's pay rolls. Looking at John Kelly's mission in politics, in its proper light, that of obtaining the largest possible amount of spoils, no man can view these results and deny that he was a great leader. He reduced politics to such a perfect system that, when his power was at its height, he made the government of this city literally a matter of bargain and sale. He quarrelled with Governor Cleveland because the latter would not take this view of public office, and he quarrelled with every Mayor who made like objection. He had Tammany Hall organized into as subservient an army of mercenaries as ever existed, and we had an example of what he was able to do with them when, in 1884, he threw almost their solid vote against the Presidential candidate of his party, whom he had repeatedly pledged himself to support. He literally sold his whole Machine vote to the Blaine managers in return for Republican votes for his candidate for Mayor, and nobody can examine the figures of the returns and not be convinced that the bargain was kept by both sides. The failure to deliver quite enough to insure success in the election undoubtedly had much to do with hastening Kelly's death. He had made a final and remarkable demonstration of the perfection of his system, but he had failed in a stake for life or death.

That bargain of 1884 was only an instance on a large scale of what goes on in every municipal election, and what must, from the nature of the case, go on in every election so long as the present machinery is continued. Mr. Ivins shows with great clearness why this must be so The State has neglected to supply the needed machinery of elections beyond the mere recording, receiving, and counting of the vote. Gradually there have been built up to supply this deficiency three political organizations, composed of men who have taken up this as the most profitable business lying open to them. They have gone into it from no motives of public duty or patriotism, but simply to get a living The more extravagant and corrupt politics can be made, the better living will they get. They cannot be blamed for this. They have taken up a business which nobody else would touch. They are able to take it up solely because the respectable people have been too indifferent to do it for themselves, and too careless of the public good to provide for its doing by the State. The wonder is not that the Machines are so corrupt and unscrupulous, but that they do any good at all. They do put fit men into office occasionally, though if they were always to combine in favor of bad men, they could win in spite of all obstacles.

There are encouraging signs that the people of this city are waking up to the disgrace of allowing such a state of affairs to continue. We put a tax upon nominations for office which excludes all but rich men from getting into high positions, and we put a premium upon political dishoncsty and trickery by throwing all the machinery of elections and all the money for its operation into the hands of the worst elements of our population. We do not mean to say by this that there are no honest men in the Machines. There are many there, but the majority in all Machines is composed of men who have gone into politics because they had no other business, and were unfit for any other. We can never hope to reform this by starting a Machine composed entirely of honest men, simply because the honest men will not do the work. It is useless to talk more about reforming the Machines by infusing into them a larger proportion of what is known as the "better element." That has been tried over and over again, but has always failed and failed ludicrously. Then, too, even if we could reform the Machines, what right have we to put a tax upon candidates which is so heavy that it excludes poor men and even men of moderate means from public office? The State pays for the registration and reception of the ballot, and on precisely the same principle it should pay for its printing and distribution. Instead of this being, as some persons curiously claim, contrary to the spirit of our institutions, it is in perfect accord with it, for it is the only way by which we can be supplied with a free and untrammelled exercise of the right of suffrage.

Mr. Ivins shows, in the ingenious parallel at the close of his second paper, how completely the evils which we are suffering under Machine control can be eliminated by the adoption of the remedy which is embodied in the English law. In his third and concluding paper he sets forth elaborately and clearly the provisions of this law, whose working in the elections of 1886 can now be studied in a very exhaustive report which has recently been laid before Parliament. This report gives for the first time a detailed statement both of the expenses of the candidates under the heads into which the law divides their outlay, and of the charges made to the candidates by the returning officers The most significant fact disclosed is, that the grand total of expenditures by candidates is only a little more than one-half of the grand total allowed by the law. Omitting the universities, there were in the election 794 candidates in 460 English constituencies. The maximum scale allowed under the Corrupt Practices Act for all these constituencies was £667,400. The actual outlay on items allowed by the law was only £364,811. In Wales the maximum was £43,675, and the actual outlay was only £18,838. About one-fourth of the elections in England and Wales were uncontested, and the expense of most of these was very small. But had they all been contested at the average cost of the other three-fourths, the maximum would still not have been reached by more than £200,000.

Commenting upon these figures, the London Daily News says: "The first thing which they prove is the complete success of Sir Henry James's act. The chief feature of that act was that it laid down a maximum expenditure, to exceed which would be a corrupt practice, voiding the seat. The experts said that the maximum was placed too low—the experience of the last election demonstrates that, as usual, the experts were wrong, and that on the contrary the maximum is too high. It would be possible to reduce by at least one-fourth the sums allowed by law without in any way starving the elections. There are very few cases in which the maximum was reached."

This is a remarkable showing. Within the short space of four years, and after two elections, it has been demonstrated by actual figures that the extravagant and corrupt use of money in elections can be completely abolished by the simple process of forbidding it by law. As extravagant expenditure constantly bred greater extravagance, so on the other hand does honest expenditure breed economy, for if one candidate does not bribe and corrupt, his rival has no need to. Neither do we find in the English comments on the results achieved any intimation that there is a falling off in the popular interest in the elections. The voters go to the polls with as much eagerness as they did when they were paid for their votes.

"PULLS."

No effect of the spoils system is so striking as the way it distorts people's notions about the relations of the Government to the people. A most curious illustration of this is the apparent novelty of Mr. Cleveland's saying that "public office is a public trust." When one thinks over it a little, this seems so obvious a truth as to wear somewhat the air of a platitude. Nevertheless, when first produced it startled people a good deal, and for some months took rank as a discovery in political science. Indeed, it is still repeated in the newspapers frequently as a valuable addition to the literature of trusts. The reason of this was, that although the doctrine of trust in government had never died out in moral philosophy, or in school and college text-books, it had assumed in American politics the character of what theologians call a "pious opinion"—that is, an opinion which may or may not be true, and which it does one's soul good to entertain, but by which nobody is bound to regulate his conduct. It was open to any good American to look on an office simply as a great responsibility imposed on him solely for the benefit of his countrymen, but at the same time any one who took this view was held by politicians to be a man as unfit for office as one who felt himself bound to give his coat to anybody who had taken his cloak, would be for the dry-goods business. Two-thirds of the work of civil-service reformers has, in fact, consisted in contending with the notion that offices are not private property, and that a man who acknowledges that the public has any interest in them is not an amiable visionary.

Fifty years of the spoils system have had a somewhat similar effect on the political mind about the exercise of the appointing power. The common-sense and ordinary business view of the appointing power is, that anybody who is invested with it is bound to keep in office all persons whom he believes, on due inquiry, to be discharging the duties of their respective places efficiently, and is bound to search diligently for persons qualified, in his own judgment, to fill vacancies. Nine out of ten Mayors and Governors, however, have wholly lost this early human notion of political duty. When they find themselves charged with the duty of filling vacancies, they are very apt to look on themselves simply as the custodians of lost articles, bound to deliver them to all who can identify them, or as officers charged with the distribution of prize money or of an indemnity fund. That is to say, instead of going to work to find proper persons to fill the places, they sit down and wait for "pulls." "Pulls" are among the most curious and interesting products of the spoils system. A "pull" is an occult force by which a public officer is compelled to do something which his judgment condemns, and for which he himself sees no good reason—such, for instance, as putting in an important place somebody of whom he knows nothing, or whom he knows to be a great rascal. It is only in politics that "a pull" is ever pleaded as an excuse for doing a shameful or absurd thing. A respectable man who excused himself for the neglect or violation of any private duty by saying that he did it in obedience to "a pull," would be considered insane or a humbug. But if he says that "a pull" has made him in some manner betray the public interest, we are all disposed to go about saying, "You know, poor fellow, he could not help himself. He hated to do it, but so-and-so had a 'pull' on him, and he could not stand up against it."

The performance of Gov. Lounsbury, described in another column, in refusing to re appoint Prof. Hadley, is an almost comic example of the way in which a "pull" works. The Governor found an excellent officer in charge of the Labor Bureau of that State. The chief business of the Commissioner is the collection and arrangement of statistics touching the condition of laborers. Prof. Hadley had remarkable training for the work, was, in fact, a man such as any government is lucky in securing for such work, and, moreover, had during one term given ample proof of his fitness for it. One would expect that, under these circumstances, the Governor of a highly civilized State would at once satisfy himself that it was his duty to reappoint him. But Gov. Lounsbury did nothing of the kind. He knew the vacancy was coming, but he made no preparation to fill it. He simply sat down and waited for "pulls." They soon began to be felt. There were "pulls" from manufacturers, and "pulls" from labor organizations, and "pulls" from "callers," against Hadley. He supposed of course there would be pulls for Hadley also, and that Hadley himself must have been running about the State starting "pulls" in his own interest. But to his surprise he felt no Hadley "pulls" at all—none came from any quarter. Even Hadley said nothing in his own favor. Accordingly, says the Governor, with delightful simplicity, "in view of all these facts I decided that I should not be justified in making a reappointment." About the manner in which Hadley had done his work, or about the nature of the work to be done, not one word does he say. His explanation is all about "pulls." It is evidently inconceivable to him that anybody should expect him to reappoint a man who had no "pulls." All he says for Hadley's successor, Mr. Hotchkiss, is that he knows "the men who have endorsed him would not endorse him unless he were worthy of endorsement"; or, in other words, that his "pulls" are strong.

A STUDY IN "POLITICS."

A COMMITTEE of the Legislature of Indiana was lately appointed to investigate the condition of one of the State prisons known as the "State Prison South." It has made its report, which ought to be in the hands of everybody who still believes that public offices should be used for the reward of party service, and that any sort of politician is good enough to take charge of criminals and paupers.

The Committee found, to begin with, that the books of the prison were falsified and entries omitted, under the direct orders of the Warden; but they nevertheless discovered, without much difficulty, a deficit of $20,000. What became of the money they were unable to say, because the Warden refused to show his check-book. The Warden himself, A. J. Howard, is a most interesting person. Of course he is a good Democrat. The State being Democratic, the State prison had, of course, to be managed by Democrats, on the Jeffersonian plan. It does not clearly appear through what influences he got his place in the first instance, but the Committee found reason to believe that he used money on the directors, both when he was first elected, and when he was reëlected two years ago. The main argument in his favor which could be produced was the very familiar one, that "Jack Howard was honest and big-hearted," and always stood by his friends, and "never was known to break his word." When he was reëlected two years ago, the directors not only forebore to overhaul Jack's accounts, but reported the prison as being in beautiful order, and did not require him to renew his bond. So he went to work to steal and misappropriate with renewed vigor.

Jack Howard, like our late friend John Kelly, has a newspaper, called the Jeffersonville Evening Times, in which doubtless he denounces, or used to denounce, Cleveland and "snivel-service reform," and urge upon the President the duty of "turning the rascals out." Kelly used to make the liquor-dealers subscribe to his paper, in order to procure licenses. But Jack Howard was a more enterprising man than even Kelly, for he made the convicts subscribe to his paper, charging them on his books $4.50 per annum out of the money they earned. Those who were "hard up" were allowed to subscribe by the month, and the librarian, a convict named Martin, acted as canvasser for the journal among his brother criminals. Jack used also to borrow money from the convicts—that is, appropriate their earnings, and money sent them by their friends and on account of pensions. Sometimes, when a convict's term expired and he had to be paid what was due, Jack would be terribly embarrassed, and used to have to borrow from his subordinate officers and other "big-hearted" friends. He had other resources, too. He used to appropriate to his own use flour belonging to the prison, and "garden truck and vegetables" raised by convict labor on ground belonging to the State, and used to convert raw material belonging to the State also. Jack never advertised for bids for his jail supplies. He bought them from his friends, one of whom, a Louisville butcher, supplied "quarters and shanks" to the jail, "the choice portions going to other parties"—of course, on prison account. Besides this, Jack used to supply pork from a pork house owned by himself and his brother. He used also to inflict cruel and unusual punishments. Two men died from punishment while under his charge. The body of one was cut up and burnt in the furnace. The body of the other was disposed of without a proper inquest.

The account given by the Committee of the filth of the prison is too disgusting to be laid before any community which is not responsible for Jack or his doings. With regard to the Prison Directors who appointed him, and who regularly reported that he was behaving in an exemplary manner, the Committee find them guilty of "gross if not wilful neglect of duty," and recommend that "their immediate resignation be requested." They also declare that, as usual, Jack Howard had a ring who worked with him inside the prison. It consisted of the Deputy-Warden, the Steward, and the Clerk, each of whom had his own special share of the spoil.

The oddest figure in the affair, who would also be a droll figure, too, if anything or anybody could be droll in such a sink of iniquity, is the chaplain, a certain L. F. Cain. The Committee call him "the Chaplain," but in his examination the wretched wag called himself "the Moral Instructor." He "worked" his official position, as politicians would say, or, as the Committee say, "prostituted it," by "securing the confidence of the convicts and obtaining money from them for the alleged purpose of securing pardons for them." While he was in the prison he apparently got tired of giving "moral instruction," and determined to study medicine. Being intrusted officially with the purchase of books for the library out of a fund formed by an admission fee paid by visitors to the prison, he bought medical books exclusively, and charged them to the prison at nearly double the cost price. He was a man of very large views, in fact, and fit for something better than a retail business; for, according to one witness,

> "At one time he called the lifetime men together, and told them if they would donate him so much money—some considerable amount, I do not remember just now—that he would go before the Legislature and he would procure the passage of a bill making fifteen years a lifetime sentence; and they gave him the money, and he went to Indianapolis, and when he came back he laughed and said, if they didn't get their bill through he would get his bill through to raise his salary from $800 to $1,400."

We may add, in conclusion, that the maximum number of times in which Jack Howard was, by the evidence, seen drunk in the jail was fifty. McFadden, the hospital steward, used to get more drunk than the Warden, but apparently not so often, and the guards did a fair retail whiskey business with the convicts.

We cordially commend the report to the perusal of such of our readers as are interested either in the spoils system or in prison discipline. But we would caution those who may feel disposed to reproach the decent people of Indiana for allowing such horrors to exist so long in a State institution, not to roll their eyes over them too much. For they must not forget that a Warden has been appointed to the principal prison in this city whose character and career offer far fewer guarantees of efficiency and integrity than Jack Howard's did when he got his place. We are displaying to-day to all the young criminals in the city the spectacle of an old and life-long member of the criminal class, known as "Fatty" Walsh, at the head of a great penal establishment. We are denouncing the liquor-dealers as the foes of decency, and order, and morality, and moving heaven and earth to get a bill passed reducing their number and restraining what we consider their infernal activity, and yet we have submitted without a murmur to the appointment of an old liquor-dealer and gambler to take charge of the murderers and thieves and rioters whom his trade has created or fostered.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

THE death of Mr. Beecher leaves in the United States no man of such unique and striking personality as his, no man of such rich and strange experience, no man whose part in the anti-slavery conflict was comparable with his own. His face and form and motion were as individual as his mind. For those who knew him well they seemed its inevitable expression.

> "His eloquent blood
> Spoke in his cheeks, and so distinctly wrought
> That you might almost say his body thought."

His humor twinkled in his eye. One had but to see his mouth to know his nature's tenderness; and equally his enjoyment of all things purely sensuous—all lovely colors, all beauteous forms, and all delightful sounds. The physical volume of the man was necessary to his intellectual energy and to his stormy eloquence. His impassioned outbursts would have been ridiculous in a man of slighter mould. His appearance during the last years of his life, if it did not gain in fineness, acquired greater impressiveness from his ruddy face and flowing silver hair. A stranger could not meet him on the street without knowing him to be no ordinary man; without wondering if he were not quite extraordinary.

He was one of many children in the house of his parents. So far as we can trace his qualities to his immediate progenitors, his mother seems to have done much more for him than his father. His love of nature and of all beautiful objects and his glowing piety were distinctly her impression. Of beauty as a means of grace Lyman Beecher had a very poor opinion. "It is all moonshine," he said, "with no doctrine, nor edification, nor sanctity in it, and I despise it." But the mother died when he was three or four years old, and her immediate successor was of such strict and ghastly manners in religion, and the father spared the rod so little, that the wonder is that religion and morality were not equally distasteful to the boy's maturer mind. Mrs. Stowe has written that as a child not a single toy was ever given to him, nor any little fête. And yet, because he was a boy and had good health and knew where sweetflag grew, and where the sassafras and chestnuts and the hickories were to be found, he was not by any means unhappy. Doubtless it was by force of contrast with the grim and loveless circumstances of his youth that beauty had for his manhood a keener zest, and love a more insatiable charm.

Father Taylor objected to Channing that he had not had a liberal education. His meaning was that the latter had only been to college—that he had none of his own rough-and-tumble sort of life. Doubtless the Boston Latin School and Amherst College did much for Mr. Beecher, though in neither was he devoted to the curriculum; but what made his education liberal was a habit early formed of eager observation—a passion for good books, not mainly theological—the homely life of rising Western towns—the necessity for making his strength self-serviceable in many ways—the political and theological circumstances of his early manhood. "A course of mobs," said Emerson, "made Phillips the best stump-speaker in America." Mr. Beecher's experience of one mob in Cincinnati—that which destroyed the press of James G. Birney—was a distinguished factor in his anti-slavery education; but for his lessons in the art of public speech his main reliance was on the rudeness of his congregations at Lawrenceburg and Indianapolis, the necessity of making himself apprehensible to them by speaking in the vernacular and with the aid of abundant illustrations. There was a time when the attractions of the ministry for him were less than those of journalism, at which he made some trial in 1836 as temporary editor of the Cincinnati Journal. The Birney outrage happened during his brief incumbency, and his first anti-slavery work was done in the way of vigorous denunciation of that miserable affair. That he had already attained to some strength of fibre, to some capacity for individual thought and purpose, is witnessed by his conduct here and by his rejection of the theological system which his father, with "logic afire," was at that time doing noisy battle for against the "Scotch-Irish-Presbyterian-Calvinistic fatalism" rampant in the region roundabout.

The time spent at Lawrenceburg and Indianapolis, ten years in all, may be regarded as a time of preparation for the succeeding forty years of Brooklyn life and work. That was the ante-room in which he tuned his instrument before he came upon the stage. It is true that his 'Lectures to Young Men' date from this early period, and they still have a steady circulation. They were important, too, as bringing him the recognition which resulted in his call to Brooklyn. But they were essentially 'prentice work. On his arrival in Brooklyn he had already done something in the line of book-making, lecturing, and journalism—the three avocations that were to engross him more and more, but without taking anything from his preaching, the work which he rightly apprehended as his regular vocation, and to which he made all other things subordinate. His earliest connection with journalism was, as has been said, in Cincinnati, when, theologically, he was—

> "Wandering between two worlds, one dead,
> The other waiting to be born."

His next was with the Western Farmer and Gardener, the first non-political paper published in Indiana. The love of flowers and of all green things growing was native to his mind; but in connection with his editorial work in Indiana he entered on those horticultural and floricultural studies which became a passion in his later years, furnishing him with myriads of apt and striking illustrations for his talks and sermons, and making a seedsman's catalogue more fascinating and religious for him than a theological treatise. Of much more importance was his editorial connection with the Independent, and later with the Christian Union. The former was the principal vehicle of his anti-slavery opinions. His editorials were dashed off at the last moment, but the immediate haste was justified by ample preparation, not only from complete acquaintance with the current topics of the time, but also from a thorough knowledge, broadly but not finely accurate, of our political and constitutional history. The Christian Union was his most characteristic journalistic enterprise. His object was to make a journal like his church, in which persons of every sect might come together in a genial fellowship. With excellent coöperation, his success was great and admirable in accomplishing his object, together with a circulation reaching at one time to 130,000. It would be hard to overrate the diminution or obliteration of sectarian boundaries involved in such an enterprise as this.

The Plymouth Pulpit was another of his regular serial publications.* From week to week it contained his sermons and his prayers. It went on for several years, and was an immense extension of his pulpit influence. His books, with two or three exceptions, were also reproductive in their character; they were made up of extracts from his sermons and selections from his articles. His 'Life-Thoughts,' the sermon-excerpts of a friend, succeeded by a similar volume which he much preferred, probably did more than any other agency to win for him the sympathy and admiration of the young people in America—the many thousands who, in normal schools and female seminaries, and humbler colleges and theological schools, were preparing to do the teaching and the preaching of a generation, and to shape its thought and feeling. His novel 'Norwood' showed him in no new light. There was nothing in it which was not in his sermons in a better form. His 'Life of Christ' is without any critical value, and its discontinuance is not a matter for regret. It was a brilliant paraphrase of the New Testament narration, in which Mr. Beecher spoke ten times from his emotion to once from his reason. That he did not sooner resolve to write his autobiography, and carry out his purpose, is a great pity.

Mr. Beecher's voluntary lecturing, as that part of his lecturing might be called which was not necessitated by the pressure of political events, was simply the more secular, social, political, or æsthetic side of his Brooklyn preaching seeking a wider audience. It gave fuller scope to his humor than his Sunday pulpit, and to his skill in repartee when there was any "talking back." On this he actually throve. What would have disconcerted Sumner, what would have left Phillips simply imperturbable, was exactly what he needed to bring him fairly to himself. He never did so well as when there was some violent and noisy opposition. No orator of the anti-slavery conflict had his control of adverse elements, or his power to rouse a sympathetic audience to its highest pitch of generous enthusiasm and heroic purpose. When, at the Broadway Tabernacle in 1860, he seized the chains John Brown had worn, and, making them a symbol of all slavery, dashed them to the floor and spurned them with his feet, those who were witnesses to that "jubilee of sublime emotion" were lifted to a seventh heaven of impassioned ardor for humanity.

Less emotional, but more intellectual, and, as a revelation of his personal force, alone in his experience, was the series of addresses made in Great Britain in the fall of 1863. In the reports of the speeches the questions asked, the cheers, the gibes, the laughter, occupy almost as much space as Mr. Beecher's words. If sometimes the result seemed doubtful, his pluck and humor and good-nature triumphed in the end. At Liverpool it took him an hour and a half to get control of the meeting; then, for an equal length of time, he had his way with it. The series of addresses, five in all, was a masterly vindication of the position and the purpose of the North. In each he treated a new aspect of the matter, making good Dr. Holmes's comment: "Mr. Beecher delivered a single speech in Great Britain. . . . Its exordium was uttered on the 9th of October in Manchester, and its peroration on the 20th of the same month in Exeter Hall." This "single speech" made Mr. Beecher for a time our most honored citizen. If in England it did less than has sometimes been reckoned to change the course of public sentiment, it did much, and it gave the sympathizers with the North their first good opportunity to show their strength and to enjoy a splendid vindication. For the speech was not more bright and humorous and audacious than it was just and strong and wise.

Mr. Beecher was not at any time an abolitionist in the technical sense of that term. His anti-slavery position was that of the Republicans, as such: freedom national; slavery sectional. But while legal interference with slavery stopped for him at the State boundary, for moral interference he accepted no such limitation. The vote rolled up for Frémont and for Lincoln had no individual aid superior to his. His brother Thomas once said of him that he had no more backbone than an eel. But it was a faulty analysis which charged him with lack of courage. In 1850, amid and in defiance of the pro-slavery violence stimulated by the compromises of that year, he opened his church to Wendell Phillips, overruling the trustees. In 1866 he took sides with President Johnson. Of the President's character and motives he had no rightful apprehension. His position was an expression of his abiding faith (in which he had great companions) that a policy of the largest clemency was the best policy of reconstruction. But the act which marked his utmost courage was his support of Cleveland in 1884. Often impulsive, he was here exceedingly deliberate. In 1876 he was resolved as clearly as in 1884 that if Blaine were nominated he would bolt the ticket. To oppose an impersonal crowd of hundreds or of millions does not require the courage necessary to oppose a dozen friends. For Mr. Beecher, liking to be liked and loving to be loved, fond of success and popularity, it must have been a fearful thing to array a score or two of his best friends against himself, and at the age of seventy-one to endanger, if not shatter, the congregation which was his joy and crown. Nevertheless, he did this thing, and waited the event. It was less damaging than his partisan Republican parishioners expected and desired.

It was, however, as a preacher, not as a writer, journalist, or orator, that Mr. Beecher was most proudly conscious of himself, and it is as a preacher that he must principally be considered in any general estimate of his influence and fame. He was the most remarkable preacher of his time, the most popular, the most influential. He preached to nearly or quite 5,000 once a week, and the art of printing multiplied this number many times. No preacher ever spoke more freely and frankly about his methods as a preacher than he did in his 'Yale Lectures' and elsewhere. His ideals were simply the reflection of his individual ways and means. He did not blunder into his success. He studied other preachers, but he studied still more carefully himself. He was very careful of his general health and of his immediate physical condition. On Sundays he was ascetic. On Saturdays he loafed on principle. On Sunday morning the chosen subject was magnetic to the multitude of data, read or observed, with which his mind was stored, and it pounced on its own wherever it found it. The sermon had little organic unity. Its parts were always better than the whole. These were what the people carried away—the telling passages, the striking sentences. He theorized that sermons should have dull and dreary passages to rest the audience, and as he theorized he preached. The illustrations and the bursts of eloquence made the main impression. His illustrations were innumerable. He was always on the watch for them in his walks about town and his rambles in the country, and later they came trooping to his call. To be appreciated, it was necessary that he should be heard; for he was a good actor, and, lacking his impersonation, the illustrations and the humor lack more than half their value. His whole body was at the service of his art. Sometimes there was no heart in his vehemence, but at other times it was so central that his whole frame trembled and shook with his emotion, and the very building seemed to rock beneath him as with an earthquake's throes.

"All men like poetry," said Emerson, and Beecher was essentially a poet. Few of all our major poets have said so many poetical things, so many beautifully tender and pathetic things. Then, too, he was well-nigh our greatest humorist, sometimes as broad as Dickens, sometimes as delicate as Charles Lamb, sometimes as gentle as Thackeray, or as satirical—and he could suit the action to the word. Here were two great attractions, but the greatest was his humanity and his sympathy with all things human. He was a man, and nothing human was foreign to him. His delight was with the sons of men. He had a great and overwhelming sense of the Divine Love, and he never tired of celebrating its incarnation in the life and character of Jesus Christ. He was very far from being orthodox, judged by any of the traditional or formulated creeds. His theological preaching varied with his moods, but it was habitually less sound than his deliberate doctrinal expressions. But even these at various points—election, human depravity, atonement, future punishment—were much at variance with the Westminster Confession, the God of which he denounced as "barbaric, heinous, hideous." The "salvation" of his preaching was Christian manhood: a clean body, a sound mind, a clear conscience, a good heart—not escape from any possible doom beyond the grave.

Already his influence upon theology and religion in America has been very great.

> "All can raise the flowers now,
> For all have got the seed."

But forty years ago the rigidness of dogma and the exclusiveness of sect were much more intolerable than they are now, and Mr. Beecher has done more than any one else to scatter and tend the seed from which a harvest of untheological religion has sprung up. What he has done he will go on doing—not by his printed words to any great degree, but through the mediation of hundreds of preachers and thousands of the laity who have been touched and quickened by his spirit. In all the nooks and corners of America, as well as in its populous cities, there are men and women who owe to him their escape from a religion of terror, and are grateful to him for a gospel full of hope and cheer.

Few men of his time had so much admiration as was granted him; few had such honor and success; and few were tried as he was in the furnace of adversity. If it is true that never after this did he have the weight, the influence, the authority in political and religious matters which he had before, it is equally true that the afterthought of many grew less and less adverse to him as the years went by. To many who hated him for political or theological reasons, "the great scandal" was a pretext for despising him for which they were not ungrateful. But many others (and a much greater number) have not and never had a doubt of his complete and perfect innocence of any serious fault; and all who have any adequate appreciation of his great career must feel that, whatever fault was his, it was inherent in a nature strong and sweet and sane, and that it cannot be permitted to outweigh his general devotion to all high and noble ends. "They say, best men are moulded out of faults"; and, if he was not moulded out of his, he was, in spite of them, a man most kind and lovable, of splendid gifts, of generous purpose, and of lasting service to mankind.

BRITISH POLITICS AND SOCIETY.

LONDON, March 5.

THE present Government is a Ministry of surprises. The resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill, the displacement and death of Lord Iddesleigh, and the entrance of Mr. Goschen into the Cabinet have been followed by the retirement of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach from the Chief Secretaryship for Ireland, and the appointment of Mr. Arthur Balfour in his place. The news is but a few hours old, and is still in the stage of discussion and speculative contradiction. There are journals and news agencies which prefer to be startlingly wrong rather than to be unobtrusively right, and they are trading in the public uncertainty and curiosity. But the news is true. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach suffers from an affection of the eyes, necessitating, it is said, an immediate operation. In almost any other office than that which he has held it would be possible for him to take a few weeks' leave of absence. But the Irish Secretary cannot "interpose a little ease" even for a few hours. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach is respected by every one. He is a good type of the English country gentleman in office—a man of business and a man of breeding. Officially hated by the Irish Nationalists, he is not personally disliked by them, as Mr. Forster always was and as Sir George Trevelyan came to be. In society and by those who have served with him and under him he is in the highest degree popular. The rumors which are already afloat that his ill health is political as well as natural, and that he differs from the policy on which the Government has decided, would best be answered by his remaining in the Cabinet in some unlaborious department, changing, perhaps, his seat in the Commons for a peerage. But before the present Ministry was formed Sir Michael used to talk not only of declining office, but of giving up public life altogether, and he may before a long time has elapsed act on that intention.

His successor, Mr. Arthur Balfour, who gives up the Secretaryship (not the Secretaryship of State) for Scotland for the Irish Secretaryship, is one of the ablest men in the Government and in the House of Commons. But it may be doubted whether he is by temperament fitted to deal with the Irish members. He is critical, fastidious, and, though personally amiable, not free from a certain intellectual sensitiveness which verges occasionally on irritability. The nephew of Lord Salisbury, there is a good deal of the Cecil disdainfulness about him. A less razor-edged instrument than his intelligence would probably do better the rough work of hewing Parliamentary blocks.

It would seem, after all, that something might possibly come of the Round Table Conference. Hitherto it has been regarded with a mixture of curiosity and scepticism, in which the scepticism has decidedly predominated, as if the five gentlemen seated at it were engaged in a sort of political table-turning, waiting until that piece of furniture tilts up, not without suspicion of a confederate leg, and proceeds to rap out a response. Perhaps, after all, in a sense different from Wordsworth's, there may be "a spirit in the wood." A letter of Sir George Trevelyan's to the Unionists of Aberdeen, and a speech delivered by him at a House dinner in the Devonshire Club, unreported and obviously distorted and discolored in detail by second-hand versions, but no doubt accurately represented in its general bearings, shows a hopeful and even confident temper. Though Mr. John Morley has declared that the principles, the policy, and the plan of Mr. Gladstone must be respected, there can be little doubt that the plan must go if the principle and the policy are to have legislative effect given to them. The scheme for governing Ireland, in imperial matters, by a Parliament elected exclusively by the constituencies of Great Britain, is absolutely incompatible with elementary constitutional doctrines. It would reproduce in substance the state of things from which Grattan's Parliament was a successful revolt, and would not differ much from the Grenville, Townshend, and North policy which led to the American Revolutionary war. The fact that, for the exigencies of the moment, the Irish members were consenting parties to the arrangement, could not make it lasting. No nation could consent to be permanently excluded from deliberation on those great matters of foreign and domestic policy the power of dealing with which distinguishes a nation from a province or a dependency. The problem of union or separation would present itself in the question, Shall Ireland have this sovereign power in association with England and Scotland, through its representatives in an Imperial Parliament or as a separate nation, accidentally ruled by the same monarch as England, just as England and Hanover were until, on the death of William IV., their differing laws of succession separated the two countries? The problem which is before the Round Table in the first instance, and which, if they solve it to their satisfaction, will come before Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell in the second instance, is to make home rule compatible with and subject to the Parliamentary Union. The condition of business in the House of Commons, not now only but during many Parliaments, shows the need of an arrangement by which purely insular concerns, British and Irish, shall be referred to purely British and Irish assemblies, whether called legislative bodies, or national councils, or parliaments, while the common affairs of the United Kingdom, and these alone, shall be dealt with in a united Parliament, in which Great Britain and Ireland shall be equally represented. In the imperfectness of political nomenclature, the word Federal is that by which an arrangement of this kind can be least misleadingly described, though text writers, guiding themselves by precedents and definitions, may prove that federation, as in the United States, in Switzerland, in Germany, and in Austria-Hungary, is impossible in the United Kingdom. Very likely, but in the art of politics, as in the art of poetry, definitions must follow practice, instead of tying down practice to themselves. In the meantime, it must be observed that the Round Table Conference is conducted entirely by members of Mr. Gladstone's late Cabinet. Lord Herschell, Sir William Harcourt, and Mr. John Morley remained in it to the last. Mr. Chamberlain and Sir George Trevelyan seceded from it, objecting to the plan and not to the principle and the policy. Lord Hartington and the larger and more important section of Liberal Unionists who declined to admit the principle or entertain the policy, and who therefore refused to join Mr. Gladstone's Ministry, hold aloof from the conference. Lord Hartington and his followers still give their support to the Government, in which they are represented by Mr. Goschen; and the concessions which would satisfy Mr. Chamberlain and Sir George Trevelyan might leave the Hartingtonian Unionists unreconciled.

The social gatherings which accompany the Parliamentary session have commenced. Mrs. Peel's receptions follow the Speaker's Parliamentary dinners, which are ruled by an order as rigid as that which governs the debate, and one which is much better observed. These dinners are given on Wednesday, the only Parliamentary day on which an afternoon sitting is held. At the first dinner the Speaker entertains such of her Majesty's Ministers as have seats in the House of Commons; on the second, the members of the preceding Government. On the third, Privy Councillors and other members of former administrations who have not been included in the recent political arrangements of either party, are the Speaker's guests, and no doubt much candid conversation is heard with respect to men and measures. Then the rank and file of Parliament follow by batches until the whole is exhausted. Many members have been in the habit of refusing the Speaker's invitations. Old Cobbett did so more than half a century ago on the ground, stated by him in his letter of apology to the Speaker who then was, that he was not accustomed to the society of gentlemen. Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright used to do so—the former until the day of his death, the latter until he took office—from an insurmountable reluctance to put on court dress. For Mr. Bright, when he became a Minister, a new uniform was invented of black velvet, to spare him the necessity of investing himself in the blue Windsor uniform with its epaulettes and sword. Very well he looks in his court suit. When M. Blowitz intruded himself into the prison of a celebrated French political offender, uninvited and for interviewing purposes, the victim described himself as struck by the approach of something which resembled une boule surmontée par une orifice. Mr. Bright, in his velvet attire, looks like a stately pin-cushion, surmounted by a singularly handsome and venerable countenance, and endowed with locomotive properties. The number of persons who entertain Mr. Cobden's objection to court dress is considerable in the present House of Commons, and for them the Speaker has arranged a supplementary banquet, not exclusively Parliamentary, for which evening dress suffices. There are still grumblers, for among working-class members the modern dress-coat and white tie are viewed as bourgeois symbols. The deference shown to the Speaker is probably unique in the attitude of popular representatives to their President. He is addressed in conversation as "Sir," a title otherwise given only to the King, when there is one, and to royal princes. There have, indeed, been two exceptions to this monopoly. The late Sir Robert Peel told Lord Stanhope, the historian, that when Mr. Grattan became a member of the British House of Commons, those Irish members of the United Parliament who had sat at Dublin with him, always addressed him as "Sir." Lord Castlereagh was among those who did so. A similar sign of deference is studiously observed by many of his younger colleagues and other members of his party to Mr. Gladstone. The unceremonious habits of English society, in which the use of the words "Sir," or "My Lord," or "Your Grace" are becoming obsolete, and are scarcely heard except from tradesmen, servants, and dependents, is rather an insular peculiarity, involving departure from the stately formality of a previous generation, as well as from existing European and, I presume, American usage.

Mrs. Peel's receptions are naturally of wider scope than the Speaker's dinners, not only as regards numbers, but as regards quality, and include all that is most notable in political society. In the suite of stately rooms of "the Speaker's house," from the walls of which the present Speaker's predecessors gaze down upon the assembled groups, no more dignified and urbane host, and no more graceful hostess, could discharge the duties which fall to Mr. and Mrs. Peel. The other principal places of political receptions are, for the Conservatives, Lady Salisbury's in Arlington Street, and Mrs W. H. Smith's in Grosvenor Place; for the Liberals, Lady Granville's in Carlton House Terrace, Lady Spencer's at Spencer House, near St. James's Palace, and Lady Rosebery's in Lansdowne House, which has been let to the late Foreign Secretary during the absence of the present Governor-General of Canada. More places of reception are, for the Conservatives, Lady Stanhope's in Grosvenor Place and Lady Hayter's, the wife of Sir Arthur Hayter, a subordinate member of Mr. Gladstone's last Government, once an assistant whip of the party, and the son of a more celebrated whip. The palmy days of great houses and great hostesses are, however, over—the days when youthful Macaulays were introduced by brilliant Lady Hollands in historic palaces to ambassadors and earls. In their place is to be seen a staring crowd, looking about them, like a party of personally conducted tourists deserted by their conductor, obviously ill at ease as to their behavior, and uncertain as to what is expected from them.

The periodically renewed rumors of the conversion of the Times into a penny paper are again afloat. No doubt the intention will be denied until it is executed, and probably with truth, for when the purpose is definitely framed it will be promptly put into effect. The public will be innocent of the knowledge until it applauds or condemns the deed. Meantime the newspaper offices are perplexed with fears of a change which, if it takes place, must have momentous consequences. It will be fatal either to some of them or to the Times itself. Whether the Times at a penny would remain the Times is the question, and it must be either the Times or nothing. Under Mr. Buckle's editorship it has certainly recovered something of its old authority, and the decline in its circulation has been stopped and has even been turned the other way. Notwithstanding, there have been signs of weakness in Printing-house Square. It has condescended to recognize the man in the streets, and at the railway stations, and on the knife-board of the omnibus, by the issue of bills of contents after the manner of its penny rivals. These bills are scantily supplied, it is true, and they are hidden shamefacedly in obscure corners. Still they are there, if you look for them. The Times is apparently dabbling its foot timidly in the water until it can make up its mind for a plunge. The hesitation is excusable. The step it is supposed to be meditating means either suicide or a magic renewal of youth and strength. The quality and not the quantity of its circulation has of late years been its stronghold; and that has made it the medium through which public men of all parties express themselves when they have had anything to say by the press. Its law and Parliamentary reports make it essential to lawyers and politicians. To "write to the Times," and to "see a thing in the Times" are not mere survivals of speech: they express a belief in its unique character. Can it retain the features which have given it this pre-eminence for a penny? L. L.

THE REPORT OF LORD COWPER'S COMMISSION.

DUBLIN, February 28, 1887.

THE Royal Commission on the Irish Land Laws, presided over by Lord Cowper, has presented its report to Parliament. The only representative of the tenants on the Commission (a Conservative farmer from the County Armagh) dissents from the general report, and promises to present his own within a short time. The published report may therefore be looked upon as representing the landlords' view of the question; and, as such, it completely justifies the Plan of Campaign and the proposals made to Parliament last autumn by the National party.

The fall in prices during the last two, as compared with the preceding four, years is stated to be 18½ per cent. This, in conjunction with unfavorable seasons, has so impaired the farmers' ability to pay rent that an immediate revision of judicial rents is recommended. The Commission proposes the following changes in the law as regards rents: (1) The revision of rents every five years, instead of fifteen; the revision to be effected according to the general average of prices which have ruled during the five years preceding the revision, as compared with the average of prices for the five years before them. (2) The admission of leaseholders to the land courts to have fair rents fixed. (3) The admission of town-park occupiers, exclusive of those who hold less than five acres, of pasture farms up to £100 value.

As to the first suggestion, nothing is said on the most important point of how the percentage of fall or rise in prices is to be applied to the increase or diminution of rent. The admission of the classes of tenants referred to in the second and third suggestions has been claimed by the Irish members as a matter of justice on every opportunity since the introduction of the Land Bill in 1881, and was refused peremptorily by both Liberal and Tory Governments. The proposal to regulate rents according to the average of prices for periods of five years would be impracticable. The principle is undesirable, and no clear suggestion is made as to how it is to be applied. The amount of produce of any farm depends on the capital employed as well as on the skill of the farmer and the seasons. The cost of labor is quite as important an element in determining the net profit as the prices realized. So is the amount of capital employed and the rate of interest to be allowed upon it. Cereal produce, meat of all kinds, and butter are imported from all parts of the world into Ireland, as well as exported from it. Prices are not, therefore, dependent on local conditions alone; the good prices in any quinquennial period would not be a guide to the rent that could be paid in a succeeding period of lean years. Where a payment is small in proportion to the value of the annual produce, as in the case of tithes, the money value may be made dependent on prices without much inconvenience; but where rent presses on the means of subsistence, as in many districts in Ireland, it cannot be so regulated. Instead of facilitating the collection of rent, such a method would encourage its being withheld, and would give rise to perpetual disputes and claims for the introduction of other elements into the calculation.

Rents in Ireland are now in theory perpetual in duration, though uncertain as to their amount. In France and Switzerland the creation and imposition of perpetual rents are forbidden by the Constitution or by fundamental laws; they are looked on as inconsistent with the true conditions of liberty and democracy. Rents in Ireland should be made redeemable, instead of trying to perpetuate them. The existence of a small rent-receiving class, retaining, attached to their rents, undefined powers of interference with the conditions of tenure, is not consistent with the economical and social health of an agricultural community.

As remedies for the evils of congested districts, which are defined as being those where the soil is poor and the population too dense to live upon its produce, the Commissioners recommend (1) technical education for children, (2) emigration, (3) migration of families to other parts of Ireland, (4) colonization. As to the details, how and at whose expense these things are to be done, nothing is said. It may be remarked incidentally that it is a mistake to suppose that the Irish Nationalists are opposed to emigration. What they have protested against is the schemes offered and enforced by the Imperial Parliament, which provided little more than the bare passage of the emigrants and often of very unfit classes, who, flung in shiploads on the shores of strange countries, with no further provision, were likely to be as badly off as if they had stayed at home. Irishmen have also claimed that a Government's first duty is to make the conditions of life at home—so far as laws can do so—such as to enable the population to live and thrive, instead of seeking to get rid of them by any and every means, which has been the English policy in Ireland from time immemorial. When the population of Ireland was under three millions, it was said to be overpopulated; the same is said now when the population has decreased by more than three millions in thirty years, and when four or five million pounds are paid away annually to absentee land-owners.

The other recommendations of the Royal Commission deal with the policy of enabling the tenants to purchase up the landlords' interests by State loans. They do not advise compulsory expropriation, or any change in the terms on which loans are made, but make a multitude of small proposals, with the object of enabling landlords to get rid of legal and technical difficulties and obstacles in the way of selling their estates. They omit, however, to make suggestions as to establishing any system of cheap and speedy transfer for the proprietary interests to be conferred on the tenant. This is an all-important matter; the law and practice of land transfer and with respect to the devolution of real estate in the United Kingdom are such that no system of small proprietorships of land could endure or be successful under it. Within the last thirteen years I have known it to take nine years from the institution of the proceedings to get the sale of an estate completed. The average time taken to sell an estate in the Land Judges' Court is officially stated to be two years. The costs of selling or buying real estate are enormous, and increase in inverse proportion to the size of the estate. The preparation of the deeds of transfer is only a small portion of the cost incurred in a sale; but I have known the purchaser of a small parcel of land to pay for his transfer deed five times as much as he paid for the land. It is a crime for any Government to confer the ownership of land upon peasants without at the same time making provision for its certain, cheap, and speedy transfer and devolution in future. In most of the British colonies land is transferred on the record-of-title system with certainty and cheapness. In many colonies professional assistance is unnecessary. In Switzerland land can be bought and sold by the yard at a trifling and known cost. It is the same in nearly all other civilized European countries; the only heavy expense being the duty charged by the State on transfers.

The omission of any mention of this matter from the report of Lord Cowper's Commission evidences its incompetence and the incompleteness of its inquiry. The Nationalist party gave no evidence; the witnesses were almost altogether landlords, agents, and officials. Nothing was, however, expected to come of the Commission's inquiry; the enlargement of the rent provisions of the Land Law to include the classes excepted at present will probably be the only useful result, for such a change introduced by the Conservatives would meet opposition from no other party. The neglect, however, of establishing a system of cheap and easy transfer may possibly prove fatal to the plan of lending public money on the security of the tenants' holdings. When it takes years to sell a parcel of land, and when the cost of doing so is uncertain, but always great, it is evident that small parcels of land are a bad security from the fact of their not being marketable. Land reformers have often pointed out that the reluctance of banks (the natural traders in loans) to lend upon land is one of the greatest condemnations of the English land-transfer system. When the owner of a small lot of land subject to a mortgage to the State gets into difficulties, he cannot dispose of his interest until he may have become hopelessly involved, and incurred a bill of law costs which may leave him without anything from the realization of his estate. He cannot, moreover, sell to the best advantage when he meets a buyer with an appetite, for nothing can be done without lawyers' aid, and nothing can be done off-hand. Many small freeholds have from such causes been eaten up by costs attendant upon family arrangements and partitions.

The opportunity offered by a sale through a Government Commission is the most favorable for arranging for the future free transfer of land so sold. The title is cleared; the land is identified and defined by a map. If the record-of-title system were adopted for all such land, it would be a marketable and good security. The possession of a small parcel of land would not then be, as Lord Brougham thirty years ago said it was, and as it still remains, "a ruinous extravagance for a man of small means."

The general meaning of the report of the Cowper Commission, then, is in the sense of making amendments in the existing laws, of grafting new statutes on to the already complex laws relating to the relations of landlord and tenant and the purchase of land. It recommends no new departure, not even simplification and consolidation of the existing laws. If its proposals are embodied in legislation, they cannot be expected to contribute much towards a settlement on a permanent basis of this troublesome and vital question. A LAND VALUER.

THE ELECTIVE SYSTEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On page 163 of the current volume of the Nation, "A. H.," in commenting on the statement that Harvard has been the leader in the "elective system," claims the leadership for the University of Virginia, and quotes a paragraph by Prof. Noah K. Davis in support of the claim. During the last few years this claim has again and again been made, but, in the opinion of some, upon a misunderstanding of the term "elective," which is applied to the system of the University of Virginia, but is there used in an entirely different sense from the more commonly accepted meaning. That it may be understood in what way the system of the University of Virginia is elective, the following is a brief sketch of the "elective system" and the University of Virginia "elective system."

The main facts are these. At Harvard, in 1823 and 1824, sixty-four years ago, the Faculty (Reports of the President of Harvard College for 1883–84 and 1884–85) "began to elaborate a system of instruction and discipline for students in the liberal arts which has come to be known as the elective system, because it permits each student, under limitations and guidance which are partly artificial but chiefly natural, to choose his subjects of study." Previous to the time mentioned, a uniform "curriculum" prevailed in most, if not in all, colleges in the United States, to which the student was required to conform. It extended over four years, and prescribed not only the kind of studies, but the order in which they were to be taken. Further, all persons admitted were presumably candidates for a degree (no provision being made for persons not candidates for a degree), and only in connection with such persons is the term "elective system" applied generally at present.

In 1825 laws were adopted at Harvard which provided for the admission "of persons who are not candidates for a degree" and "for the consideration, to a limited extent, of the desires of students in the arrangement of their studies." Beginning with some "electives" at this time (1825), it was not until 1841 that the electives became numerous, when they were allowed in all years except the Freshman year. In 1846 the electives were restricted to Junior and Senior years, where they remained for twenty years. In 1867, electives were allowed in Sophomore year again, and were gradually extended to Freshman year, so that at present there are only a few required studies in Freshman year.

In order that a person may be admitted into Harvard College and become a student under the elective system, he must pass an entrance examination, and that the student thus admitted may be recommended for a degree, it is required (Harvard Cat. 1885–86. The requirements given below have been changed, Cat. 1886–87, but are quoted because they are in part yet in force, and show the numerical standard required), that the applicant has obtained as a minimum "two-fifths of the maximum mark in each of the prescribed studies of the college course and of the prescribed number of elective studies, and has, moreover, attained one-half of the total maximum mark for each year of the whole course from the time of his admission."

Besides the provision for regular students, at Harvard in 1825, it was announced that "The University is open to persons who are not candidates for a degree, and who desire to study in particular departments only." This was the result of a committee report, which said "that provision should be made for the admission and instruction of students in the University who may not wish a degree, but to pursue some particular studies to qualify them for scientific and mechanical employments and the active business of life; such students to have a right to choose their own studies, and, upon passing the regular prescribed course with the approbation of the Government, to be entitled to a certificate stating their character and qualifications." The provision for these students was repealed in 1847, and none were admitted again until 1876. At present these persons are called "special" students, who are admitted to the courses of study in Harvard College (Cat. 1885–86) on satisfying "the Faculty of their fitness to pursue the particular courses they elect, although they have not passed the usual examination for admission to College," and "a certificate of proficiency" is given, if desired, to any special student who has "attained not less than seventy-five per cent. of the maximum marks" in his chosen subjects. The special student may receive a certificate on Commencement Day and honors.

At the University of Virginia, which commenced its first term on the 5th of March, 1825 ('A Sketch of the University of Virginia,' 1885), the scheme of instruction is based upon a system of "schools," each under the exclusive control of its instructors, in each of which "a separate degree is conferred denominating the recipient a 'graduate' in that school." "The University may . . . be fairly regarded as a collection of schools, each devoted to a special subject." In 1826 the Faculty proposed "To drop all the old unmeaning titles, and adopt in their stead the single term of 'GRADUATE,' except in the Medical School, where it will be necessary to retain the title of M.D. The degree of Graduate shall be conferred on those only who have acquired an accurate and extensive knowledge of the subject of one or more of the classes (in a school), or in any single language. . . . The exact title shall be GRADUATE U. V." This would not do, for in 1828 the Board of Visitors invited the Faculty to consider "whether it may not be proper to adopt the ancient denominations of Bachelor, Master, and Doctor, or some of them." In 1832 a degree with the title "MASTER OF ARTS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA" was conferred upon "those persons who had graduated in the Schools of Ancient Languages, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Moral Philosophy, and in at least two of the languages taught in the School of Modern Languages"—at present French and German are prescribed (Cat. 1885–86). In 1848 the degree of "Bachelor of Arts of the University of Virginia" was established.

The system at the University of Virginia (Cat. 1885–86) "allows students to elect for themselves the departments to which they are led by their individual tastes and proposed pursuits in life. This freedom of election commends itself particularly to those who desire to make special attainments in some one department of knowledge."

"No student is subjected to entrance examinations, except Virginians seeking free tuition."

"A certificate of DISTINCTION is conferred on one who has attained three-fourths of the value of the questions at any General Examination."

"A certificate of PROFICIENCY is conferred on one who has passed examination on —— special subjects"—of which there are nineteen.

"A Diploma of GRADUATION is conferred on one who has passed examination on —— general courses"—of which there are twenty-two.

A comparison of the requirements and awards for special study at Harvard and elective study at the University of Virginia shows very close agreement. At Harvard, "elective studies" are not mentioned in connection with special students. At the University of Virginia election is not mentioned in connection with degrees. The election at Harvard is for a degree. The election at the University of Virginia is for special study without reference, necessarily, to a degree.

At the University of Virginia the requirements for degrees were prescribed, and were rigidly adhered to, except in the School of Modern Languages in the M. A. and two options in the B. A. degree, until 1880-81, when some modifications were made in the requirements, which have resulted at the present time in giving "options" in several degrees; but during these changes the highest degree of the University, "Master of Arts," has had its requirements inexorably fixed. The requirements for degrees are adhered to at the University of Virginia in a way that is without parallel in any college curriculum. In all prescribed courses the minimum of 75 per cent. has to be attained. No substitutions whatever are allowed. No excess in one study can make up for the least deficiency in another; tradition saying, for example, that in one case a student excellent in classics lost his degree of M. A. because he made only 74.5 per cent. instead of 75 per cent. in one of his scientific subjects. Any question as to the meaning of a degree of the University of Virginia has never been asked there, except, perhaps, during the past four or five years. Election at the University of Virginia, as far as degrees are concerned, simply means that the student may take the prescribed studies in what order he pleases and in what time he pleases or can. "The student obtains them (the Honors) whenever he can undergo the rigid examinations to which candidates are subjected."

If at Harvard it were said that passing in a certain number of special courses would entitle to a degree, then there would be something like an approach to the elective system of the University of Virginia. If there be leadership in either direction, it rather seems as if it belonged to Harvard, for, since 1880 81, the University of Virginia has made its degree of Bachelor of Arts much more flexible than ever before, and has conferred upon it some little of the indefiniteness of which so much complaint is made.

With regard to the religious exercises at the University of Virginia, they are voluntary in quite a different way from the courses of instruction. They are in no way connected with the University officially, and are not part of the scheme of education. No provision is made by the government of the University for religious exercises. The Chaplain is supported by the voluntary contributions of faculty and students. He has no official standing in the University. He is the private chaplain of certain persons who happen to be at the University. The success of the elective religious system is just the same kind of success as religion meets with in the world outside of the University.—Yours respectfully,

W. G. BROWN.

THE TARIFF AND SOCIALISM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article by Mr. E. L. Godkin in the March number of the New Princeton Review, on the political and social aspects of the tariff, presents a view of the tariff question that is too much neglected. The controversy over the pecuniary results of the present system in the United States, although important, may fairly be regarded as of much less importance than the question of the effect of the policy of protection on our political and social institutions.

It may be said that the fundamental principle of American, as well as of English constitutional law, is the protection of the rights of the individual—or, more correctly stated, the protection of the individual in the legal enjoyment and assertion of his rights. It is for this purpose, chiefly, that laws have been made and administered. If we turn to the records of the proceedings of the courts, as found in the published reports of cases, both in the United States and in England, we find that the great effort of those who have been charged with the administration of the law in both countries has been to develop and apply, sometimes under the most adverse conditions, those great principles of personal liberty which are regarded as peculiarly the birthright of the Anglo-Saxon race. Even in criminal cases, in which the State intervenes to avenge a public wrong, the tendency has been to increase the safeguards of the accused, even at the expense of certainty and swiftness in the execution of justice.

In view of these legal traditions, and of the opposition which has been manifested, especially during the first half of the present century, by the people of the United States, to the idea of "paternal government" in various forms, it scarcely seems credible that they deliberately and intelligently entered upon their present protective policy, which exhibits one of the extremest forms of socialism. That they did not do so is sufficiently proved by an examination of our tariff laws, which discloses on every page the influence of private interests; and so far has this influence been carried that not infrequently we find it violating the very principle in whose name it is exerted.

But, whatever may have been the forces that brought the protective system up to its present condition, the system is here, and it is important to understand what it means. Its ostensible basis is protection to "American labor," or, to state the case more definitely, to those laborers who are employed in certain industries. No advocate of the system would admit that it is intended principally to benefit the manufacturer, the capitalist. Its justification is derived from its supposed benefit to the laborer.

Now, taking this principle as the proper basis of legislation, we are led logically and unavoidably to the regulation by the State not only of the price of products, but also of the rate of wages. It is believed that no legislature has as yet attempted to fix the rate of wages which shall be paid by private employers to a certain class of laborers, but if A, a consumer of a certain article, may be required to pay to B, the manufacturer, a certain price for the benefit of C, the manual laborer, why may not B reasonably and legally be required to pay a certain proportion of that price to C? In other words, why may not B legally be required to pay to C that portion of the price which the lawmaker intended that C should have?

It is evident that this would place society on a socialistic basis. But such legislation, instead of introducing a new principle, would simply give a definite and substantial form to the theory of protection to the laborer, which supports the present tariff system. J. B. M.

RESULTS OF SANITARY INSPECTION IN CHICAGO.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Some time ago a committee of British experts, on a visit of inspection to this country, pronounced the sanitary work of the Chicago Board of Health superior to that of any other city in this country. Chicago seems to maintain that supremacy, and to vie with any city in Europe in its successful coping with filth, disease, and tenement-house abuses. By the courtesy of the able Health Commissioner, Dr. Oscar C. De Wolf, to whom this work is largely due, I am enabled to give the following results, which have just been tabulated:

Years.	Population.	Total mortality.	Number per thousand of population.
1881	540,000	13,874	25.69
1882	560,693	13,234	23.60
1883	580,000	11,555	19 92
1884	630,000	12,471	19.80
1885	604,634	12,474	18.76
1886	704,000	13,699	19.43

With an increase of 164,000 in the population the actual number of deaths has diminished. If the mortality had increased 30 per cent. in the last five years, as has the population, the deaths in 1886 would have been 4,337 greater than they were. The lives of over 4,000 were thus saved.

The best indication of the health of a city is the fewness of deaths from zymotic diseases, such as fevers, which are held to be in large measure the result of poor sanitary conditions. Judged by this test, the results in our leading Western city are equally striking with those just given:

Years.	Number of deaths from zymotic diseases.	No. of deaths from zymotic diseases per 1,000 of population.	Deaths from all causes under 15 years of age.	No. of these deaths per 1,000 of population.
1881	4,213	7.80	7,371	13.65
1882	4,509	8.05	6,645	11.90
1883	3,053	5.25	5,875	10 13
1884	3,506	5.26	6,666	10.58
1885	3,210	4.83	6,187	9 32
1886	3,437	4.88	6,763	9.61

Years.	Deaths under one year of age, from all causes.	No. of these deaths per 1,000 of population.	Percentage of deaths of all ages from zymotic diseases to total mortality.
1881	4,374	8.10	30.37
1882	4,059	7.25	34.07
1883	3,850	6.64	26.42
1884	4,179	6.63	28.11
1885	4,000	6 02	25.73
1886	4,081	5.80	25.09

As is well known, not a house can be erected in Chicago until the plans have been approved by the Health Commissioner, who can order changes; nor can the house be occupied or the plumbing concealed until a second inspection. Old houses must be remedied of unhealthful conditions, or vacated on order of the Commissioner, who examines every house and tenement in the city every year or two without waiting for complaints. Instead of young medical students who know almost nothing of sanitation or plumbing, practical plumbers, and competent, if not highly educated, assistants, are employed as inspectors under the direction of expert sanitary engineers. The results are shown above; for, although Chicago is too young to have the rookeries and consequent mortality of some older cities, there is no way of accounting for the remarkable decrease in the death rate unless it be ascribed to the work of the Board of Health. Not only have the lives of over four thousand a year been saved, but the homes, and consequently the health, of tens of thousands of others have been improved, doctors' bills saved, and decent modes of living made possible. Similar results will follow similar work elsewhere. Edward W. Bemis.

THE PHILADELPHIA POSTMASTERSHIP.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your review of the two years' administration of Mr. Cleveland, you charge that the President did not fairly carry out his promises in some cases as to removals from office, and cite the removals in Philadelphia.

I wish to put upon record the facts as to the removal of Mr. Huidekoper, the Postmaster. On the 6th of June, 1885, in company with some ten members of the Philadelphia Independents, I called upon the President to urge the retention of Mr. Huidekoper, Mr. Valentine, the District Attorney, and Mr. Eyster, the Assistant Treasurer, and these alone. We were all strangers to the President, and were introduced and had a very satisfactory interview. Within a few weeks one member of the delegation, without informing the others of his proposed action, wrote to the President, reminding him of the interview, and saying that he desired to withdraw all support of Mr. Huid koper, and, in fact, made serious charges affecting him in his official capacity. No intimation of this action reached the other members of the committee until after the removal in November following. In entire ignorance of it, none other of the committee took any further steps on behalf of Mr. Huidekoper, and no refutation was made of the charges, which, in justice to him, I must add, were entirely groundless. The circumstances were very unfortunate for Mr. Huidekoper, for they doubtless caused his removal, the President naturally taking the utterances of one member for those of the whole committee. Mr. Eyster served out his full term. Mr. Valentine is still the District Attorney.

Respectfully, etc.,

Jos. Lapsley Wilson.

TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your interesting column of letters some time ago were several anecdotes connected with changes of names. Allow me to present the following as a companion:

Many years ago, on a farm in Vermont, there was a Frenchman at work whose surname was Papillon. His fellow-laborers found the name difficult to pronounce, so the owner of the farm suggested his being called by the English equivalent, Butterfly. That was adopted, but soon grew too long, and degenerated into "Fly." He never knew any other. His descendants would find it difficult to trace their ancestry if they desired, under such circumstances. From the aristocratic Papillon to "Fly" is indeed a great descent.—Very truly yours,

Cecil Hampden Howard.

Notes.

G. P. Putnam's Sons publish immediately 'The Inter-State Commerce Act,' with an analysis and a legal dissertation on the legality of the act, by John R. Dos Passos, of the New York bar. They have also in press 'The American Electoral System; its Character and its History,' by Chas. A. O'Neil, of the New York bar.

Probably no provisions of the Inter-State Commerce Act will involve more dispute than the phrases "like service" and "substantially similar circumstances and conditions"; but similar terms, and in some instances identically the same terms, have been used in the railway acts of Great Britain for more than thirty years, and the English courts have been called upon frequently, and in diverse circumstances, to construe them. Robert Clarke & Co., Cincinnati, have in preparation, to be issued in a few weeks, an annotated edition of the Inter-State Commerce Law, collecting all these authorities.

Harper & Bros. are about to publish 'Wasteland Wanderings,' by Dr. Chas. C. Abbott, the well-known New Jersey naturalist; a 'Manual of International Law,' by Lieut. Geo. B. Davis, U. S. A.; translations of three stories, 'Baldine,' etc., from the German of Karl Erdmann Edler; a translation of Paul Célière's 'Startling Exploits of Dr. Quiès'; and Blackmore's 'Springhaven.'

T. Y. Crowell & Co. have nearly ready 'The Death of Ivan Ilyitch, and Other Stories,' by Count L. N. Tolstoi; 'Cuoré,' by Edmondo De Amicis; 'Sigrid,' from the Danish of J. T. Thoroddsson; and 'The Picture of Paul,' by the Rev. H. R. Haweis.

Funk & Wagnalls announce a new edition of Dr. Lyman Abbott's 'Henry Ward Beecher, his Life and Characteristics,' with many portraits.

'Juanita: a Romance of Real Life in Cuba,' yet not all fiction, written (as we infer, about 1830) by the late Mrs. Horace Mann, is to be published by D. Lothrop & Co., Boston.

Under the title, 'Celebrities of the Century,' Cassell & Co. will soon publish a biographical dictionary of the century, "containing condensed accounts of the lives of every man and woman who have won distinction during the years from 1800 to 1887, no matter what quarter of the globe they may be natives of." This work, in one large volume, is edited by Lloyd C. Sanders, of Christ Church, Oxford. They will also shortly begin publication of Prof. Henry Morley's 'History of English Literature,' in twenty volumes. The whole narrative will be continuous, but the volumes will be grouped in sections, which may be read as distinct histories of periods, and each volume will be separately indexed.

'English as She is Taught,' announced by Cassell & Co., is a public-school teacher's scrap-book of actual mistakes recorded in her experience with her pupils.

The first two volumes of the six-volume edition of Browning, undertaken by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., will appear in April. They will shortly add Marston to their series of "English Dramatists."

An édition de luxe, limited to 100 copies, of 'Half-Hours with American Authors,' is promised by J. B. Lippincott Co.

Mr. C. H. Howard, of the Astor Library, is about to issue, through F. Housh & Co., his lecture on the 'Life and Public Services of the late Gen. J. W. Phelps,' read in December before the New England Historic-Genealogical Society in Boston. He is also preparing 'Amherst in Prose and Verse,' a companion to his 'Brattleboro.'

Craig & Barlow, Chicago, have in press 'Romanism: The Danger Ahead,' by A. J. Grover, a lawyer of that city.

D. C. Heath and Co., Boston, will issue at once, in their series of "Monographs on Education," a paper by Prof. J. F. Genung of Amherst College, on "The Study of Rhetoric in the College Course."

'Letters from the Far East' is the title of a forthcoming book, by Col. De Lancey Floyd-Jones, U. S. A., now on the press of the Public Service Publishing Co., of New York. It will contain a number of full-page illustrations from photographs collected en route.

Mr. James Payn is gathering into a volume, to be called 'Holiday Tasks' (London: Chatto & Windus; New York: Scribner & Welford), certain of his pleasant little papers in a lighter vein, akin in style to his 'Some Private Views' and 'Some Literary Recollections.'

Mr. R. H. Tilley, Newport, R. I., is preparing for publication his 'Genealogical Queries' for 1887, and desires all who intend to insert queries therein to send them as soon as possible. His purpose is to have it ready and distributed by June 1, sending a copy to each public library, State library, historical society, and every person known to be interested in genealogy in the United States and Canada. One hundred and three copies will also be sent to England.

The Rev. Dr. John Croumbie Brown, Haddington, Scotland, author or compiler of several works on modern forestry, offers to present copies to the extent of his ability to public libraries in this country, on receiving a certificate from the State government along with the application.

We are informed by a circular from the Faculty of Letters of Lyons (France) that they propose to issue a photolithographic reproduction of the celebrated manuscript known under the name of Bible vaudoise. This manuscript is one of the treasures of the library of the Palais des Arts at Lyons. It contains the greater part of the New Testament, and has, at the end, a Vaudois or Cathar ritual of the highest interest for the history of the attempts at religious reform in the Middle Ages. The manuscript contains five hundred pages, of which fifty were published in 1878 by Foerster. It is said to be very difficult reading on account of the great number of abbreviations, and the reproduction will consequently be as interesting to palæographers as it will be useful to students of Romance philology.

'The French Principia,' Part iii (Harper & Bros.), presents itself in a very attractive form for a school-book, and a careful examination of the contents only confirms the good impression made by the material execution of the volume. This Third Part is an 'Introduction to French Prose Composition,' by the Head Master of the French School, Christ's Hospital, the Rev. P. H. E. Brette, author and annotator of other valuable text-books. It is upon the plan of Smith's well-known 'Principia Latina.' The grammatical information is so full and so clearly given that a pupil who had only an elementary knowledge of the accidence of the language might use the book satisfactorily, to acquire all that is absolutely necessary in order to write French correctly. The plan pursued in the exercises is not new. There are numerous passages of English prose to be translated into French, with many carefully made notes and references to the grammatical portion of the book. The only objection that suggests itself is that the extracts seem very serious, very little space being given to the colloquial part of the language; but doing that perhaps would have made the 'French Principia' differ too widely from the books upon which it has been modelled. Besides its other advantages, the work is provided with an excellent index, a very full set of questions on French Composition, and a sufficient English-French vocabulary.

The praise we have heretofore given to M. de Rougemont's 'La France,' as a truly useful text-book in schools, can only be repeated with emphasis in view of the new edition, to which the Writers' Publishing Co. have added a map of France, while improving the quality of the binding, etc.

In the series of monographs published in Paris by J. Rouam, under the title "Les Artistes Célèbres" M. Champfleury's 'La Tour' takes a high place by its literary quality. It is a very graceful, informal presentation of episodes in the life of this famous painter in pastel, rather than a consecutive biography, and is really a study of men, women, and manners in the eighteenth century. Thus we are shown La Tour's relations, as a portraitist and otherwise, with Rousseau, Diderot, Voltaire, Mme. de Pompadour, Mlle. Camargo, Mlle. Fel, etc. Many portraits of this group are reproduced here, and sufficiently well where a crayon effect is concerned. The copies of engravings after La Tour are inadequate except as memoranda. Incidentally, M. Champfleury, citing a letter from Rousseau to La Tour, remarks the careless employment of avait (avais) eight times in four lines.

M. Camille Saint-Saëns, the distinguished composer, has just published a most interesting little pamphlet on a subject which would seem quite out of his line to any one not aware of his active interest in all the arts. This is a 'Note sur les décors de théâtre dans l'antiquité romaine' (Paris: L Baschet; New York: F. W. Christern). Considering the elaborate architecture of the Roman Theatre, of which that at Orange may be taken as the best known example, he shows the incongruity of the ornate and abundantly sculptured decoration of the proscenium for the effect of the acted drama; and he suggests that the light and attenuate columns which appear so frequently in the Pompeian frescoes, are a decorative reminiscence of the slight wooden scaffoldings which he supposes to have been erected inside the stone proscenium whenever a performance was given on the stage. He supports this suggestion by a reproduction of certain frescoes, and by an apt quotation from Vitruvius.

Within the past year M. Octave Uzanne, editor of Le Livre, has published two books of interest to all book-lovers—'Nos Amis les livres' and 'La Reliure moderne'; and now a third is announced, 'Bouquineurs et Bouquinistes: Du Pont-Royal au Pont-Marie—Physiologie des Quais Parisiens.' This is a monograph on the open-air book trade along the parapets of the Seine, the favorite fishing-ground of the book-hunter, as Mr. Lang has shown him to us in his graceful ballade. The book will have an etched frontispiece, and about a hundred sketches by M. Émile Mas scattered through the text. The edition will be limited (Paris: Quantin; New York: F. W. Christern).

A new series of "Shakspere Reprints" (London: Whittaker & Co.), consisting of parallel texts of the First Quarto and First Folio, with variations of the later Quartos and Folios at the foot of the page, edited by Wilhelm Vietor, Ph.D., Professor in the University of Marburg, is begun with "King Lear." The editor reproduces the Pied Bull Quarto from the copy known as the British Museum Perfect, but he was obliged to depend upon a friend's transcript and subsequent verification of the proof until the facsimile of it by Prætorius was published. For the Folio likewise he relied on the facsimile, and for the readings of other texts on Furness or the Cambridge editors. The difficulty of work under such a system is the greater in this case, because only two of the six copies of this quarto collated by the Cambridge editors are alike, being made up of corrected and uncorrected sheets in various combinations. A brief comparison of the present reprint with the quarto facsimiles and the collation in Mr. Daniel's preface shows that the editor's work is not scrupulously exact, slight errors in spelling (III, iv, 124, note Q 1) and in punctuation (V, iii, 41, note Q 2) and variations from the typography (V, i, 19) being noticeable; but these are immaterial, so far as we have observed, to the study of the text. The volume is small and handy, and the series will be very serviceable in bringing together the facts of the texts for convenient study.

We have already characterized the handsome edition of the "Waverley Novels," manufactured by the Messrs. Black in Edinburgh, with the American imprint of J. B. Lippincott Co. Two more volumes, 'The Bride of Lammermoor' and 'The Heart of Midlothian,' have come to hand with their refreshing typography. From the same American house we have another volume in the pocket Thackeray edition of Smith, Elder & Co., the 'Irish Sketch Book.'

A magnifying glass should be thrown in with the new edition (12mo) of 'Nuttall's Standard Dictionary' (Frederick Warne & Co.). Everything has been sacrificed to condensation. It is illustrated.

'The Romance of Invention,' by James Burnley (Cassell & Co.), is a treasury of curious facts and anecdotes relating to nearly every department of mechanical industry. These are told in an entertaining way, the monotony inseparable from such a subject being often avoided by the skilful grouping of topics by some remote connection instead of the natural one of similarity of aim. The range is very wide, embracing all ages, and treating of inventive cooks, hair dressers, and toy-makers as well as the Arkwrights and Stephensons. Accounts are also given of the alchemists and the pursuers after the phantoms of perpetual motion and the eternal lamp, and there are chapters showing ingenuity in concocting poisons and devising tortures and punishments. In the chapter on "Castles in the Air" we do not find a reference to the great instance in which a balloon was of practical importance, in enabling Gambetta to escape from Paris. The space given to Nasmyth's love story would have been used to better purpose with an account of his steam hammer, remarkable among inventions from the fact that, instead of being the result of long and costly experiments, it sprang, Minerva-like, full-grown and perfect from the inventor's brain. It may be well to note, in case a second edition is reached, that the first successful newspaper in this country was the Boston News Letter, published in 1704. The book is made useful for reference by an excellent index.

Not devoid of brightness, and not without some merit in respect of efforts to inculcate domestic virtue, is a story called 'Forced Acquaintances,' written for young girls by Edith Robinson (Ticknor & Co.). It is, nevertheless, a poor production, ill-balanced and tedious; too much is said of disagreeable details, too little of grave wrong-doing, while the dialogue and character-drawing are unsatisfactory.

Mr. Elliot Stock's promised "Book Prices Current: a Monthly Record of the Prices at which Books have been Sold at Auction," is before us in the January number. It is a comely duodecimo pamphlet of sixty-four pages, and is sold only to subscribers, at £1 5s. 6d. per annum. Each title is numbered, the last here recorded being No. 1,040, while in every case the auctioneer's catalogue number is given in brackets. Under each sale the arrangement is alphabetical, by authors if possible, and hence it is easy for collector or dealer to find the entry that interests him. If Bewick, here is the first edition of the 'Quadrupeds' selling at £3 13s., and the second for £2 5s.; if Cruikshank, here is his 'Comic Almanac,' fetching £2 8s., or his 'Phrenological Illustrations,' in the original wrappers, £2 12s.; if Dickens, here is the first edition of 'Oliver Twist,' original cloth, £6 17s. 6d.; if Ruskin, here is the first edition of the 'Stones of Venice,' £16 5s.; if Shelley, here is the first English edition of 'The Cenci,' £1 4s., etc., etc. Still, an index embracing all these titles under one alphabet would greatly enhance the convenience of using this catalogue; nor would it cost much.

The second number of the Audubon Magazine (New York: Forest and Stream Publishing Co.) has for a frontispiece a process reproduction of Audubon's plate, "The Great Auk."

The January issue of the American Naturalist shows a marked improvement in its typographical appearance, beginning with its cover. The cause is to be found in the new imprint, the magazine being now published by J. B. Lippincott Co.

In Science for March 11, Prof. Mendenhall, improving a hint of De Morgan's, constructs curves showing the relative use of long and short words by Dickens ('Oliver Twist' and 'Christmas Carol'), Thackeray ('Vanity Fair'), Mill ('Political Economy' and 'Essay on Liberty'), Edward Atkinson in sundry writings, and Cæsar ('Commentaries'). These curves are shown to be individual enough to warrant the prosecution of the inquiry; and we commend this not unfascinating labor to any intelligent person with sufficient leisure for it. It has its practical uses, as Prof. Mendenhall shows, and may in time be applied to the determination of Shaksperian authorship. One hundred thousand words are deemed a proper basis for the characteristic curve of any given writer. Incidentally it is shown that the mean word length of Atkinson is 4.298 letters, of Dickens, 4.342, Thackeray, 4.481, of Mill, 4.775.

Conformably to an order of the Prussian Ministry, the inaugural lectures of instructors, the discourses delivered and the books written in celebration of festal occasions, the dissertations of the graduating doctors, and various other publications made by the German universities or under their auspices, are henceforth to be recorded in an annual list. The first Jahres-Verzeichniss of this kind has just appeared (Berlin: A. Asher & Co.). It covers the year from August 15, 1885, to August 14, 1886, makes an octavo of nigh 250 pages, and costs five marks. An edition on thin paper, printed on only one side, and intended for the use of all who make card-catalogues, may be had for the same price. But the knights of the scissors and paste-pot are not the only ones who will rejoice to see the importance of this new departure recognized by so high authority.

Princeton is to have its Annex as well as Harvard, and we rejoice to record the fact. The institution will be called "Evelyn College"; will give "substantially the same course of study that is pursued at Princeton College, including the lectures of the professors, with examinations upon them"; "will have no sectarian character," nor "will anything of the nature of co-education be represented in it." The building is all ready, comfortably and even luxuriously fitted up, and the first term will open on September 28, 1887. A preparatory department is provided. Elective studies, except in the case of Greek, are confined to the Junior and Senior years. Application for information should be made to the Rev. J. H. McIlvaine, D.D., President.

The Harvard Summer School of Geology will open its sixth session at Cambridge on July 6, at the Museum of Comparative Zoölogy, under the direction of Profs. Shaler and Davis. A fortnight spent there in introductory work and short daily excursions will be followed during the next four weeks by excursions to the Connecticut Valley, the Hoosac Valley and vicinity, and the foot-hills of the Catskills. "Advanced knowledge of geology will not be required, but only teachers, graduates of colleges, or persons of maturity and some training, can be admitted"—and men only. Applications should be made to Mr. T. W. Harris, Divinity Hall, Cambridge, Mass., not later than June 1. The expenses, including tuition, are calculated not to exceed $120.

Pach Brothers, 841 Broadway, send us a large photographic group showing the staff officers of the Thirteenth New York Regiment, with Mr. Beecher in chaplain's costume—cross on hat, and sword in hand—for the chief figure. Tastes will differ as to the costume and the character in which his admirers will prefer to remember the great preacher who has just left us. If the choice were left to Count Leo Tolstoi, we may be sure he would care little for the unique "portrait in uniform" now before us, good (and appropriately grim) as it is.

—Prof. C. C. Everett's article upon "The Poems of Emerson," in the current Andover Review, is not written from the literary point of view, and is the more interesting on that account. Whether he agrees with Arnold's dictum that the 'Essays' are "the most important work done in prose" in this present century, is not plain, but, after quoting it, he adds that, in his opinion, the "Poems" are "the most complete and worthy expression" of Emerson's genius. He is himself most at home in philosophy and ethics, and he certainly does not overrate Emerson's work in these departments; his analysis of it leaves a meagre residuum, and he concludes that "obviously this, so far as it can be called a philosophy, is the philosophy of a poet," and, secondly, that "as his philosophy is the philosophy of a poet, so his ethics is the ethics of a poet." It would appear that Prof. Everett thinks that "a poet's" philosophy and ethics have some privileges not shared by the ordinary scholar; but one can only admire the polemical art which utilizes so serious a reservation for a greater praise. Coming to the poems, the writer finds the usual qualities in them, but he states some of them in a way to provoke challenge. "The notion that the poems of Emerson lack passion is as wide of the mark as the complaint that they are abstract," is a remark that at first seems subversive of our old ideas, in both its assertions. Here the temper and the training of the critic count very strongly. He frankly acknowledges that he speaks of Emerson's obscurity rather "from hearsay than from very much personal experience"; but to pass the point of "abstractness," and come to that of "passion," it is clear that Prof Everett has a very different meaning in mind from the usual sense of the word, when we read that in many of Emerson's poems "there is another, if not a higher, passion than the personal." Emerson, he immediately adds, had a passion for Beauty and for the Ideal; but is this anything more than saying that he was susceptible of intellectual exaltation? It is not this quality that is denied to him when he is said to lack passion. Here, as in the question of obscurity, Prof. Everett seems to us to be executing a not very successful flank movement. Another startling remark is that in which he speaks of Emerson's poetry as "the voice of a spirit all the more confident in its optimism because it had been bold enough to gaze down into the darkest chasms of life." Was Emerson's knowledge of evil so profound? Thus one finds matter for controversy; but the paper is one which will be read with great interest, and is of higher critical value than any late contribution to the reviews.

—M. Francisque Sarcey, in a short series of articles in the République Française, has again brought up the much debated question of the importance of the French patois. He very justly remarks that a number of French words now fallen into desuetude, but still preserved in the local dialects, should be restored to the literary language. Such are aveindre, quérir, and the short and expressive form c'étant, which has been replaced by puisqu'il en est ainsi. But M. Sarcey does not stop there. He could wish the patois to be less rigorously excluded from the primary schools—that teachers in the south of France, for instance, should be allowed to use Provençal in the class-room. Thereupon his friend, M. J.-J. Weiss, writes to him from his retirement at Fontainebleau, that he has raised rather "a political than a pedagogical question." Later, a writer in the Temps raises the cry against the "Félibres" and all those who are aiming to establish a second national language in France. He sees, in the writing of Provençal poetry like that of Mistral or Aubanel, only "un divertissement de mandarin," which will always remain inaccessible to the people at large. But in the claims made by those who wish to rehabilitate the dialects of their native province he sees a serious, a dangerous tendency, which, if it could ever reach the point aimed at, would endanger the political unity of France. It may be noted that a first step has already been taken. Telegrams can now be sent officially in Provençal and Breton as well as in French.

— Professor Gneist contributes to the February and March numbers of the Deutsche Revue a sort of epilogue to his Constitutional History, in the shape of an article on the change wrought in the English Constitution by the legislation of the last fifty years, and by the attempts to wreck it in behalf of Irish autonomy. Prof. Gneist's opinions deserve respect, not only because he is probably the most thorough student of this subject of the century, but because, for a German and a professor, he is a remarkably "practical" politician, having served without interruption in the Prussian Parliament since 1859, and in the German since 1871. English institutions, he says, are in a state of solution, and cannot regain the cohesiveness in which lay their strength until the Irish element is gotten rid of. But even if the conservative classes (using the word in a social rather than a political sense) understand this, they may well hesitate to apply the remedy, for its adoption involves, by force of example, a complete reconstruction of the society of Great Britain. The Irish land bills, past and future, cannot, he says, be fitly compared with the Stein and Hardenberg legislation in behalf of the Prussian peasants, because these had for several generations been paying the taxes and performing the military service in exchange for which the land was held by the dispossessed holders. The estates in question, that is to say, were held of the Government by a feudal tenure; and as the feudal obligations, translated into modern civic duties, fell on the shoulders of the peasants, they had almost a legal claim to a share in the land. But in Ireland, according to Prof. Gneist, the peasants have no such claim; so that the property of the landlords is in part to be confiscated solely from expediency, on political and economical grounds. As there can be no limits to legislation dictated solely by expediency, the socialistic greed thus awakened will surely, he thinks, extend to the countries across the Channel. The difference between English institutions and the Continental arrangements more or less modelled on them lay in the fact that the former—Church and Parliament, local and national administrations—were inextricably intertwined, while the latter were created each to stand on its own bottom. But while, in a society so constituted, each member is a support to the others so long as itself is in a healthy state, it is a corresponding source of weakness when this condition is changed. The machinery of the Constitution, which formerly worked so smoothly, has gradually been getting out of gear ever since the first Reform Bill, owing to the enormous increase in wealth and numbers of the industrial middle class, for whose assimilation the old system did not provide. But it is possible, Prof. Gneist thinks, when a perpetually foreign element like the Irish is removed, to maintain the parliamentary form along with complete social reconstruction, although the aristocratic class is likely to become irreconcilable, as in France. As to Ireland, there is not much home rule in the scheme of autonomy which the Professor thinks the only practicable one "in view of the want of self-control of the Irish, as shown in the United States." He proposes a legislature in which the majority shall be nominated by the Crown; the local administration, modelled on the French, to consist of prefects assisted by elective councils, service in which may, in time, give the people the political understanding and experience essential to the successful working of the principle of self-government.

—'Aus dem deutschen Universitätsleben des sechzehnten Jahrhunderts' is the title of one of the most recent numbers of the "Frankfurter zeitgemässe Brochüren" (Neue Folge, Band vii, Heft 12. Frankfurt am Main: Foesser, pp. 31). The author is the celebrated Ultramontane historian, Johannes Janssen, whose 'Geschichte des deutschen Volkes seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters' has elicited so much discussion in Germany. The monograph consists of interesting extracts from a wide range of authorities, showing that immediately after the Reformation the German universities degenerated, and that in the second half of the sixteenth century they were the seats of sloth, drunkenness, murder, and many other abominations. "The ecclesiastical revolution of the sixteenth century," says the author in his preamble, "which loosened all the old bonds of discipline and order, also exerted a very paralyzing and pernicious influence upon the intellectual life and the institutions of learning." Luther himself asserted that "the universities deserve to be crushed to powder; nothing more hellish and devilish has appeared on earth since the beginning of the world" (p. 2). Melanchthon wrote in 1521 that "nothing had ever been invented more baneful and godless than the universities; not the Popes, but the devil himself was their founder" (p. 2). In 1614 the students of Wittenberg were ordered to discontinue the practice of drinking beer in the "Auditorum" during the lectures (p. 10). A student of Basel stated in 1587 that either the professors were remiss enough to lecture very seldom, or they taught without method, mixing up heaven and earth (p. 12). "The name learned," says Prof. Hofmann in 1578, "is almost detested by high and low" (p. 13). "The conduct of the students was so unseemly," writes another authority in 1557, "that the glistening tears often fell from Melanchthon's eyes during his lectures, and he frequently said that the unbounded license of the young men was a sign that the end of the world was near at hand" (p. 19). Some of the statements which Janssen cites in support of his position are, in all probability, exaggerated; for example, the assertion on page 26 that in the year 1540, within six months, four hundred persons drank themselves to death at Wittenberg. Doubtless, too, other elements besides the Reformation helped to bring about the decadence of the German universities. But the author's general account of the shocking condition of the latter during the sixteenth century may be accepted as correct.

—Mr. Welldon's translation of Aristotle's 'Rhetoric' (Macmillan) is careful and reasonably smooth and idiomatic, but the translator's admiration of the original has led him into strange statements. We will not question what he says about the neglect of rhetoric as an educational instrument in England; only we would guard against the inference that Aristotle's work has been unduly neglected, except so far as every editor, every translator, thinks that his bright particular author is a slighted wall-flower. But it is going too far to say, as Mr. Welldon does, that the art of rhetoric was the creation of Aristotle, and that "whatever has been best in it from this time to the present is due to him." Aristotle cannot be called the creator of rhetoric, and, instead of being a brilliant success as a teacher of the art, he was a conspicuous failure in comparison with Isocrates, who, in other respects, is not to be named in the same breath with him; and, profound and valuable as is the basis on which he has reared the structure of his 'Rhetoric,' his treatise had little practical worth in the eyes of his successors, who were far from being his equals in intellectual grasp, but who had the great merit of not being above their business. Mr. Welldon thinks that the field of rhetoric was amplified in a direction which Aristotle had deliberately left alone. This, again, is claiming far too much. The later rhetoricians cannot be ignored by the student of literature except at his peril, as has been amply shown by Volkmann and by Blass. In fact, modern æsthetic criticism has much to learn from these despised rhetoricians, who give us system where the modern critic gives only hints. The third book of the 'Rhetoric' seems to be accepted by Mr. Welldon unreservedly as Aristotelian, but he does not note that, if it is by Aristotle, it is a singular tribute to Aristotle's rival, Isocrates, to whom the philosopher is obliged to resort for illustrations of some of his points. In his rendering of this book, by the way, Mr. Welldon has not been invariably felicitous. So the famous εἰρομένη he translates, after Mure, 'jointed,' an absurdity from which he might have been warned off by Mr. Cope, who suggests 'disjointed,' which is certainly much nearer the mark. The vetusta versio has the droll word consuspensa, and the other Latin versions try tracta, fusa, and what not. Most scholars prefer to keep the non-committal Greek, but surely the meaning is plain enough. The λέξις εἰρομένη is the 'strung style,' the 'all-in-a row style,' the 'chaplet,' the 'rosary' style; the words being held together by the conjunction as the beads are held together by the knot of the string. In this rosary style the conjunctions are represented by the larger beads, and such a discourse could go on for ever, whereas the periodic style carries the end in itself.

— The thirty-six-inch lenses for the great telescope of the Lick Observatory, whose construction has been some five years delayed through the impossibility of obtaining the necessary glass, were completed at the workshops of the Clarks in Cambridgeport last autumn, and have been successfully transported across the Continent and finally deposited in the vaults of the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton. The matter of transportation was one of the greatest moment to the trustees, as any mishap to the lenses would defeat their expectation of completing the observatory and its equipment during the present year in such shape that it could be finally handed over to the Regents of the State University of California. Mr. Fraser, the superintendent of construction of the observatory, made a special journey to the East for the express purpose of carrying out the lenses, and the manner in which they were prepared for this journey is well described in a late number of the Sidereal Messenger. They were wrapped separately in fifteen or twenty thicknesses of soft cotton cloth. Next came a thick layer of cotton and then a layer of paper. The glasses were then put into boxes of wood, lined with felt. No nails were used near the lenses, and the boxes were made the shape of the glasses. These boxes were enclosed in two others of steel, each nearly cubical in form, and packed tightly with curled hair. Each steel box was enclosed in another steel box, the inner sides of which were covered with spiral springs. Both steel boxes were made air-tight and waterproof, and the outer chests packed with asbestos to render them fire-proof. Each was then suspended by pivots in strong wooden frames, with contrivances for turning each chest one-quarter way round every day during the journey to California. This was to prevent any molecular disarrangement in the glasses and to avoid the danger of polarization, it being feared that the jarring of the train would disturb the present arrangement of the molecules, unless the position of the glass should be changed and all lines of disturbance thus broken up. The trustees have placed the separate contracts for the other portions of this great telescope with manufacturers who have so far met with special success in the particular class of work involved, all the mechanical parts of the telescope (or mounting, as it is technically called) being made at Cleveland, by Messrs. Warner & Swasey, the micrometer or measuring apparatus by Fauth & Company of Washington, and the spectroscope—which, like the telescope, is to be the most powerful in existence—by Mr. Brashear, who has served a long and able apprenticeship under Prof. Langley at Allegheny. For obvious reasons, the trustees finally decided not to adopt the new pattern of spherical dome which has very generally been described as that which would cover the great telescope on Mount Hamilton, but placed the contract for a dome of the ordinary pattern and nearly eighty feet in diameter with the Union Iron Works at San Francisco. Of the $700,000 of the original bequest made by Mr. Lick eleven years ago, his trustees have already expended all but $190,000, and they now contemplate assembling together all the separate parts of the great telescope (which itself with accessories has cost nearly $200,000) at some time during the coming summer or autumn, when their control of the institution will cease.

GARDINER'S GREAT CIVIL WAR.

History of the Great Civil War, 1642-1649. By Samuel R. Gardiner, M.A., LL.D. Fellow of All Souls, etc., etc. Vol. i, 1642-1644. London: Longmans, Green & Co. 1886.

"THE Civil War, the outbreak of which was announced by the floating of Charles's standard on the hill at Nottingham, was rendered inevitable by the inadequacy of the intellectual methods of the day to effect a reconciliation between opposing moral and social forces, which derived their strength from the past development of the nation. The personal characters of the leaders might do much to shorten or prolong the time of open warfare, but no permanent restoration of harmony would be possible till some compromise which would give security alike to the disciples of Hooker and to the disciples of Calvin, had been not only thought out by the few, but generally accepted by the many."

This is the opening paragraph of Mr. Gardiner's new volume. The words of it deserve careful attention. They strike the keynote to all that follows; they sum up the great merits and indicate the possible deficiencies of the mode in which Mr. Gardiner looks at history.

He is essentially a student of ideas. The true subject of all his writings is not events, and the visible transactions which make up the matter of historical composition, but rather the spirit, the notions, the beliefs, the opinions, or (to speak generally) the ideas, which, as they ultimately govern human action, give its form to the progress of mankind. The special belief which, throughout every volume of his invaluable work, Mr. Gardiner keeps before his eyes, is the belief, developed so slowly and opposed by so many obstacles, in religious toleration—or, rather, in that respect for the human conscience, and for the truths discovered by the light of conscience and of intellect, which forms the real basis of enlightened toleration. So truly is Mr. Gardiner concerned with the progress of opinion that it were, from one point of view, no untrue description of his history to say that it was an account of the steps by which the doctrine of toleration was first worked out by thinkers, and then acquiesced in by the judgment of the nation.

But though Mr. Gardiner's interest may be truly said to lie in what, borrowing a term from theology, we may call the growth of political dogma, he is distinguished from writers who trace the evolution of particular beliefs, by his intense interest in actual men and women, and by the tenacity with which he clings to the conviction that (if the actions of mankind are in a sense governed by their ideas) dogmas and opinions, in so far as they are influential at all, can only exist in the minds and hearts of living human beings, who themselves are swayed by all the feelings, base or noble, which we see governing the society in which we live. It is this balance between the abstract and the concrete view of history which gives to Mr. Gardiner's writings their peculiar power, and also their very peculiar charm. He knows that "the inadequacy of the intellectual methods of the day" was in a very true sense the cause of the civil war. But he also knows, and never lets his readers forget, that the ideas, good and bad, of the seventeenth century produced very different results on different characters. Charles and Cromwell, Falkland and Pym, Bunyan and Chillingworth, were no doubt each and all influenced by the conceptions of their time. But the results of this influence were in each case very different; and for any profound understanding of the age in which these men moved you must, as Mr. Gardiner never forgets, pay at least as much attention to the personal peculiarities of the actors who played their parts in it, as to the general ideas which gave the direction to each man's individual action.

Thus, to take one example among a score, when Mr. Gardiner wishes to make us understand the various forces which led men of very different types to rally round the Crown, he does not present us with a number of abstract reflections as to the different reasons which might be adduced in favor of the Royal cause, but takes two or three men, such as Rupert, Lindsey, Falkland, and Waller, and tells us, as far as our knowledge, or rather our ignorance, allows, what were the motives which in fact determined the course adopted by each of these eminent persons. To know the reasons of their action is to understand why thousands of other less well-known Englishmen found themselves—sometimes to their great surprise—arrayed in arms for the King and against the Parliament. This mode of treating a great historical crisis has two great advantages: it gives the historian himself a kind of intellectual impartiality and calmness which is the rarest, if not the very greatest, of the gifts required by any one who is to unentangle the confused threads of great historical transactions; it impresses, again, on the reader, with a force which cannot be attained by any mere general statements, that the contest between the King and the Parliament—and the same thing is in a measure true, it may be supposed, of every great struggle—was a battle in which good men and wise men, as well as wicked men and fools, were pretty equally divided on each side. The simple truth is, that the crisis was one of great difficulty. Looking back on the great civil war from the distance of more than two centuries, it is, we conceive, possible to say that on the whole the supporters of the Parliament were in the right. They acted with more wisdom than their opponents, mainly because they had perceived one fact which was hidden from the eyes of the wisest Royalists. This was the untrustworthiness of Charles. Time has produced many worse men than Charles I.: he was morally a far better man than his father or his sons; but history has produced no man less trustworthy. The sagacity of James I., the selfish common sense of Charles II., the dull obstinacy of James II., gave adherents some characteristic on which they could rely. On Charles I. no man ever placed reliance without suffering for his folly. But though this vital fact was, when once perceived, decisive in favor of supporting the cause of the Parliament, no one can wonder that many good and sagacious men did not see the fatal flaws in Charles's character. Still less can one wonder that men who associated in their minds the supremacy of the law, the reign of order, and the very existence of national freedom, with the authority of the Crown, should have trembled at plunging into a civil war which, if the King triumphed, was likely to produce royal despotism, and if the Parliament triumphed, either anarchy or the supremacy of a military tyrant. Never was there a case where men of sense might more reasonably differ, and never was there a case where men of goodness might each think, with more show of reason, that their side was the side of virtue.

If Mr. Gardiner had rendered no further service to our knowledge of the past than to make us not only know but see why it was that the best men of England were at the time of the great civil war ranged on different sides against each other, he would deserve the thanks of all students. But our author has, from the way in which he looks at history, and the infinite industry with which he has worked out his own conception of impartial narration, done far more than merely make us understand in a general way the state of feeling in England from 1642 to 1644. He has, as we are informed by persons competent to judge, provided for the first time a detailed and intelligible account of the military events which make those years famous in the annals of warfare. He has described with the utmost accuracy the fluctuations of feeling which marked the early years of the civil contest—the intense yearning for peace, which unfortunately itself tended to prolong the war, the anticipation that the war would be of short duration, and that the Parliament might count on a speedy triumph; the disappointment which ensued when this anticipation was found to be groundless. The greatest, however, of the benefits which Mr. Gardiner has conferred upon every lover of truth is the new light which he has thrown upon the growth of the complicated body of beliefs designated by the name "liberty of conscience." He shows that the doctrine now so universally recognized, that a man for his beliefs, as contrasted with his acts, is responsible to his conscience and to God alone, was a truth which, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, not one man in 10,000 could even dimly perceive; that it gained acceptance rather from the force of practical considerations than through the strength of argument, though the theory of the relation of the citizen towards the state and towards God, which ultimately solved the most pressing problems of the age, was occasionally worked out, with more or less completeness, by solitary thinkers long before it commanded the allegiance of practical statesmen. Fuller, Chillingworth, Roger Williams each partially seized the clue which was to guide men out of the mazes in which they were involved by the traditional notion that the magistrate was bound to inculcate theological truth by use of physical power. That this was so is probably in a vague manner known to most of those likely to read Mr. Gardiner's pages. What he will make clear to many for the first time, is, first, the singular fact that the author of an anonymous tract—an author whose name cannot even now be plausibly conjectured—anticipated in 1644 the doctrines of Locke and carried them out with more consistency than the author of the celebrated "Letters on Toleration"; and, further, that statesmen who would in words have condemned the doctrine of toleration as a heresy, came (in England, at least), as the seventeenth century advanced, to perceive that civil liberty, social order, and the progressive development of society demanded that kings and magistrates should tolerate many beliefs which they did not share.

The historical importance of tracing out the spread, during the seventeenth century, of opinions and practices favoring liberty of conscience can hardly be overrated. It bridges over, or in reality abolishes, the chasm which teachers of a certain school wish to open between the men of the seventeenth and the men of the eighteenth century. The great civil war was, according to a view openly proclaimed by Carlyle and tacitly adopted by many other writers, a contest of heroes. The Revolution of 1689 was, according to the same authorities, little better than a transaction carried out by politicians whose statesmanship lacked every noble and heroic quality. Any one, however, who realizes that toleration was the need of the age, sees at once that the Revolution of 1689 in reality solved the problem which had baffled the statesmen and soldiers of the great civil war; and that the essential work of the eighteenth century was to give practical effect to ideas which had only been dimly grasped by the best and greatest men of the seventeenth century. The inadequacy of the intellectual methods of the day gave occasion to the civil war. The improved intellectual methods of the next age produced in England a period of reconciliation, peace, and progress. That this is one of the lessons that Mr. Gardiner's 'History of the Civil War' will impress upon the world is, in our judgment, past a doubt. It is taught all the more impressively because Mr. Gardiner comes forward bona-fide as an investigator and not as a preacher. Never, it may be added, was teaching more needed. The civilized world of Europe is again becoming involved in practical difficulties which have their ultimate source in the confusion and uncertainty of prevailing opinions. Wise men who study the annals of the past, will feel inclined to watch and see whether improved intellectual methods, or the recognition of some new or forgotten truth, may not close the contests of the nineteenth century, just as the doctrine of religious toleration terminated in England the feuds which culminated in the great civil war.

Mr. Gardiner is so eminent among historical inquirers that his most fervent admirers, among whom we are glad to number ourselves, need not hesitate to acknowledge that he has, like all men of superior powers, some of the defects almost involved in his great qualities. The sentences with which this article begins suggest what these defects are. He is, like all persons who delight in dwelling on the influence of ideas, a little too prone to underrate—at least, so it may seem to a careful student—the immense influence of personal character. We believe it to be absolutely and entirely true that no complete reconciliation between opposing moral and social forces could, during the first half of the seventeenth century, have been effected by the power or sagacity of kings or of statesmen. Nothing but the increase of knowledge, and the consequent growth of new beliefs, could by any possibility have put an end to the political and theological animosities which found their ultimate expression in the contest of rival armies. But it seems by no means clear that the presence on the throne of a monarch different in character from Charles might not have prevented the outbreak of a civil war. Speculations, indeed, on what 'might have been" are necessarily in one sense futile, but they are sometimes useful as enabling us to measure, hypothetically at least, how far a slight change of circumstances might have affected a given course of events. The assertion that Charles's character, and especially his untrustworthiness and his stupidity, had a great deal to do with turning latent discord into open civil war, admits of something very like proof. James I. was not a man of heroic mould. He was morally—and, it is probable, physically—a coward; but he was a man of natural sagacity, and his prudence, contemptible as were often the forms in which it exhibited itself, did enable him to keep on the throne, and in some degree to increase the royal power, without bringing the nation even to the verge of civil war. If Charles had been gifted with his father's shrewdness, there is no reason to suppose that he might not have ended his life as peaceably as did James. It is, again, perfectly clear that the sentiment of loyalty to the Crown was, during the whole of Charles's reign, a source of power which would have enabled any king of average ability not only to resist assailants, but probably to strengthen his own position. We do not for a moment suppose that Mr. Gardiner would dispute this; but if we concede that a monarch of no very extraordinary talent could have averted or postponed civil war, we in effect grant that the peculiarities of Charles's nature had at least as much to do with changing a Parliamentary conflict into an armed rebellion as had the inadequacy of the intellectual methods of the day.

ANCIENT ISRAEL.—II.

Geschichte des Volkes Israel. Von Dr. Bernhard Stade, Professor an der Universität Giessen. Mit Illustrationen und Karten. Vol. I. Berlin 1887. New York: Westermann. [Oncken's Weltgeschichte in Einzeldarstellungen.]

THE legends of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, our author emphatically asserts, embody no historical facts. They were local legends, separately clustering around sanctuaries of the ancient Canaanitish inhabitants of Palestine: the sanctuary of Hebron, the sacred well of Beer-sheba, and the sacred stone of Bethel. These spots were sacred before the arrival of the Israelites in the land. With the changes of the religious notions of the dwellers around, the character of the legends varied; they were modified and remodified. The Israelites—this appears almost certain—did not dwell under patriarchs in Palestine west of the Jordan, before their settlement in the lands east of that river. That they migrated in to Egypt is equally improbable. Joseph is a Palestinian heros eponymus, the legendary representative of a tribe; his transformation into a ruler of Egypt is a work of late fiction. Even the poetical fancy which made the Israelites enter the Nile land as a family and leave it as a nation, left all the intervening time an absolute blank; the monuments know nothing whatever of the whole affair. Searching, as some Egyptologists still do, for the Pharoah of the oppression or the traces of the exodus, is a childish amusement: nothing is to be discovered in Egypt in reference to Israelitish history. The Israelites possessed no distinct and positive historical recollections reaching back beyond the time of the settlement in western Palestine. All that was earlier recollection centred dimly in the two names Moses and Sinai. Moses had taught them at Sinai to worship Jehovah. This worship had made them a people distinguishable from other members of the Hebrew race, such as the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites.

The Hebrew race was kindred to the Arabs on the one side and to the Aramæans on the other. Closely akin to Israel were the Canaanites west of the Jordan and the Lebanon, including the Phœnicians. The Israelites were descended neither from a Shem nor from an Eber. They were called Hebrews ('ibrîm) by their western Canaanitish neighbors, as dwellers beyond ('ĕber) the Jordan—not the Euphrates, as former explanations had it. They called themselves sons of Shem when they had become masters of the land west of the Jordan, as the nobles of the land (shēm meaning name, glory, or distinction). They appear to have been originally a clan established east of the Jordan, on both sides of the Jabbok. Their heros eponymus was Israel, the legend of whom was subsequently blended, west of the Jordan, with the legend of Jacob, the seat of which was Bethel. The name of the clan was extended to others confederated with it, in the same way in which the appellations Latins, Alemanni, and Teutons have gained their widely comprehensive significations. The Hebrew clans which in later times constituted the nation of Israel, came into the Transjordanic region mainly from the Sinaitic peninsula; some immigration may possibly have taken place from regions bordering on the Euphrates, whence the legend of Abraham derives the whole race. As nomads of the peninsula they lived in peaceful relations with the probably Arabic tribe of the Kenites, and from them—who were perhaps allies of the Midianites—they seem to have received through Moses the religion of Jehovah. It was not the religion of their ancestors, but entirely new to them. A slow migration carried them into Gilead and the adjoining districts, the Judaic clan alone probably wandering northward, with the Kenites and the Arabic Calebites, into the region west of the Dead Sea. When these migrations took place, and how long they lasted, it is impossible to tell. In Gilead the nomads, hemmed in between the Jordan and the desert, by the kindred Moabites and Ammonites on the south, and by Aramaic tribes on the north, gradually turned tillers of the soil, built cities—Mahanaim, Succoth, Jabesh, Penuel, etc.—and grew too populous for their territory. The stories of the conquest and distribution of the country by Moses, of the Amorite Sihon, of Balak, and Balaam are fictions.

As the Midianites and Amalekites did in later times, the Israelites, in their nomadic state, must have made frequent plundering incursions into Western Palestine, the many fords of the upper Jordan offering easy opportunities for crossing. Peaceable transmigrations came afterward, the Israelites wedging themselves in between Canaanitish settlements, steadily gaining ground, and gradually absorbing the neighboring population. The whole history, in its more authentic features, clearly shows that there was no sudden conquest or invasion, no extermination of the natives, no deadly feud between them and the Israelites. The Hebrews, or Transjordanians, lived mostly in peace with the kindred Canaanites during the time which is generally, though erroneously, designated as the period of the judges—that is, before the union of all the tribes was effected under the monarchy. The figure of the great conqueror, Joshua, as we have seen, is the production of a late age. That no general conquest took place, and consequently no division of the conquered country, is shown by the earlier relation in the first chapter of Judges, according to which the separate tribes attempted separate conquests. That chapter, now falsely attached, as a continuation, to the book of Joshua by the words "After the death of Joshua," is evidently an extract from an extensive narrative, running parallel with that book and refuting it, which may have begun with "After the death of Moses" or "After the crossing of the Jordan." The warlike exploits spoken of in the earlier relation are, however, also far from being contemporaneous or authentic history. No such exploits, no such simultaneous movements, ever took place. The Canaanites generally held their cities, plains, and valleys, and here and there also a plateau or mountain; the Israelites mostly occupied first the intervening forest lands, which they cleared. Their peaceful advance did not exclude exceptional conquests with the sword, sudden inroads from beyond the Jordan, surprises and sacks. But these rarely effected permanent results. A part of the tribe of Dan succeeded in capturing an isolated town, Laish, in the extreme north, and establishing themselves there; Levi and Simeon treacherously surprised the Bene-Hamor of Shechem, but were driven away and scattered by the Canaanites, and Israel, instead of helping, execrated their treachery.

Israel was the first Transjordanic Hebrew clan which gained possessions west of the river. Clan after clan followed. Living among the Canaanites, they partly blended with them. Intermarriages prevailed. The sacred places of Canaan became sanctuaries of Israel. In all other matters of culture the Israelites learned from the cities of Canaan; in the worship of Jehovah they remained faithful to their own traditions and customs. Inferior in the arts of industry, they were superior to their neighbors in religious conceptions and ethical spirit. This superiority decided the product of international blending in favor of Israel. The Israelitish element began to predominate. Moral leadership led to material rule. The rural districts were won first; the towns much later, partly by Israelitish intrusion and peaceful commingling, and partly by treaty and conquest. Severe contests for possession and sharpened religious antagonism finally created permanent animosities, and the Israelite looked down upon the Canaanite as vile and fit only to be a serf to the Sons of Shem. And yet many an Israelitish gens had more Canaanitish blood in it than Shemitic. The absorption of much of the native element so strengthened some of the clans, especially those which obtained much clearable land, that they grew into separate tribes. A regular division of the people into twelve tribes, however, never existed. The country was never distributed, nor did the Israelites ever possess the whole of it.

The warlike tribe of Gad was powerful in the land east of the Jordan, and, west of the river, in the earliest times, the central tribe of Joseph. The latter, after extending its possessions in a southerly direction, was divided into Benjamin, Manasseh, and Ephraim. The tribe of Judah, in the south, arose much later, forming itself out of Israelitish, Edomitish, Canaanitish, and Arabic elements. Enveloped by it were the remnants of Simeon, which, after the discomfiture at Shechem, never rose to the dignity of a tribe. The dispersion of Levi was more complete still, but its boasting of Moses as its member united its families into a kind of a priestly caste, to whom the managing of the sanctuaries was generally intrusted. The priesthood was not derived originally from Aaron, who is unknown to the earlier traditions, but from Moses, whose descendants we find figuring as priests at the northern sanctuary of the Danites. Reuben never had any political significance, almost disappearing between Gad and the powerful state of Moab, its constant enemy. Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, and Asher, in the north, formed a group of tribes living in small clans, closely surrounded by the Canaanitish natives, whom they were unable to assimilate or to conquer. At one time only (during the struggle with Sisera) Zebulun and Naphtali appear conspicuous in Israelitish history; Issachar and Asher never acted a noticeable part in it. That portion of Dan which remained between Judah and the Philistines was almost as powerless as Reuben between Gad and Moab. The extermination of the tribe of Benjamin is unhistorical. The chronology of the pre-monarchical times is a systematic creation of late redactors, and entirely valueless. The first attempt at founding a royalty more comprehensive than clan chiefship was made by the house of Jerubbaal in Manasseh. It proved a failure, though based on Gideon's deserts as deliverer from Midian. The greater merits of Saul as deliverer from a more general and more lasting oppression led to the establishment of the Benjamite throne, and to the union of the tribes. Samuel—who, like Eli, was a priest, and not a judge—promoted, instead of opposing, this transition from tribal anarchy to monarchical unity. With it real Israelitish history begins.

We have made no attempt to acquaint our readers with any of the critical processes which have led to the construction of the foregoing scheme of the earliest history of Israel. Those familiar to a degree with Biblical inquiry in its recent stages, even if as yet ignorant of the advances made on the basis of the Graf and Kuenen theory, which has completely changed the relative value of the main Old-Testament narratives, will neither be surprised by the results stated nor ask for explanations, which must needs transcend the bounds of a review in a journal like this. Readers who know only their Bible and apologetic commentaries, and perhaps an apologetic Bible dictionary, will, we have no doubt, be amazed at statements so often flagrantly at variance with the best-remembered texts of the Scriptures, and not a little inclined to attribute some of the assertions to defective knowledge, wrong judgment, or evil propensity on the part of the critical innovators. Such suspicions we are unable to disarm here by evidences to the contrary, but we owe our general public the assurance that the work itself completely refutes them. Never has the minute examination and dissection of historical tradition been carried out with more painstaking earnestness, sounder knowledge, and greater freedom from religious or anti-religious prepossessions, than in the histories of Wellhausen and Stade. In the work of the latter author, which in its analysis of the traditional accounts is firmly grounded on the writings of the former, the destructive analytical labor is so convincingly justified by intrinsic evidence from the respective texts—the Hebrew as well as the Greek of the Septuagint—that only he who shuts his eyes to all evidence conflicting with cherished notions can gainsay it. Of course, we are far from saying that no point of detail can be contested. The constructive labor of the author, in which more originality is evinced, is naturally based in part on conjecture, and his conjectural facts are, we confess, often propounded with too much positiveness. It is, perhaps, owing to the frequency of instances in which hypothesis must do duty for knowledge—a frequency demanding a reiteration of acknowledged doubt too tedious to carry out—that much appears presented with an assurance not warranted by the saved remnant of dissected tradition. The plausibility of the facts or conditions constructively elicited here from a mass of conflicting testimony is generally very strong, though a most plausible guess but too often proves a mistaken guess when verification is possible.

Recollections of a Private Soldier in the Army of the Potomac. By Frank Wilkeson. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887.

THE author of this book thinks that the generals have had too much to say in regard to the history of the war, and that it is high time the privates had their turn. His contribution will certainly be welcomed, for it is a vivid picture—perhaps a little too bloody and harrowing, but none the less realistic—of the life of the private soldier, upon whom fell, as in all wars they must fall, the greater portion of the hardships, suffering, fatigue, hunger, cold, and death, which are inseparable from war, and which, in the accounts of strategic movements and brilliant charges, are apt to be overlooked. As a contribution to history, books like this are only valuable in so far as they recall the intense savagery, the relapse into cold-blooded barbarism, which is the accompaniment of war, and again as they describe the morale of the rank and file of a particular army at a stated time. Further than this, of course, the recollections and opinions of a private soldier, with his necessarily circumscribed vision, have no historical value. But in the two respects above stated this book is valuable.

The writer enlisted in the winter of 1863–64, and went to the front in company with six hundred bounty-jumpers—escaped criminals all, or nearly all. His active service lasted just six weeks, from the crossing of the Rapidan to the first assault of Petersburg; but they were the bloodiest six weeks of the whole war, and a blood-curdling tale does he tell of them. Deaths of the most horrible character, sickening wounds described at length, rifling of dead bodies, stealing rations from comrades in the fierce struggle for existence, cowardice of the bounty-jumpers and "coffee boilers," cruelty from officers to men, heartlessness, dissatisfaction, discontent, insubordination—all make a picture which can hardly be characterized as other than revolting. Yet it would be rash to deny its accuracy in any particular. It is only half, or less than half, of the story of the Army of the Potomac during those terrible six weeks, but it is a half which it is well not to forget.

As to the morale of the army, what the author has to say is of great interest. When the first fight in the Wilderness was over, and the troops were withdrawn from their lines, the men said to each other, "When we get to the Chancellorsville House, if we turn to the left, we are whipped; if we turn to the right, . . . it will indicate the purpose of Grant to fight." When they reached that point, they turned to the right. "Instantly all of us heard a sigh of relief. Our spirits rose. We marched free. The men began to sing. The enlisted men understood the flanking movement. That night we were happy." Yet six weeks later—six weeks in which every day had seen an engagement and every week a battle—the same men said, "No, we are not going to charge. We are going to run toward the Confederate earthworks, and then we are going to run back. We have had enough of assaulting earthworks. We are hungry and tired, and I we want to rest and eat." And the author brings a charge which we have never before seen in print, viz., it was not so much the men who shrank at that time, as the officers; for while the losses among the enlisted men during the two periods, May 4–May 31, and June 1–October 28, were approximately equal, yet the losses among general officers during the first period were four times as numerous as during the latter.

Of the criticisms and opinions of the enlisted men on the course of the campaign, and of the system of "news-gatherers" who passed from camp to camp at night carrying the news of the day, much interesting information is given, and the following extract is worth quoting without abridgment:

"The enlisted men spent much time in comparing Grant with McClellan. The latter had many warm friends among the soldiers. He only, of all the men who had commanded the Army of the Potomac, was personally liked and admired by his troops. Soldiers' eyes would brighten when they talked of him. Their hard, lean, browned faces would soften and light up with affection when they spoke of him—and still it was affection only; they did not, as a rule, concede to him military talent. And the general opinion among them was—given Grant in command of the army in 1862, and the rebellion would have been crushed that year. Asked how McClellan would have done with the army of 1864 under his command, they shrugged their shoulders and said dryly, 'Well, he would have ended the war in the Wilderness—by establishing the Confederacy.'"

The Private is not content with telling his personal reminiscences and drawing a striking picture of the savage scenes through which he passed; in addition, he has his theory of the proper conduct of the war. It is only briefly stated, and is confined to the Preface, being neither proved nor disproved by anything in the text. His theory is, that the disasters of the war were due to two causes, (1) the calling for volunteers instead of enforcing the draft at the outset; (2) the placing of West Point graduates in command of troops. As to the first, it need only be said that a draft in 1861 was politically impossible; incidentally it may be noted that it would have put worse men in the ranks than the system of volunteers. As to the second, the Government acted largely on his theory in 1861 when it appointed Butler, Banks, Frémont, and Sigel among its first major-generals and assigned them to important commands. It was only disaster that caused the Government to look among trained soldiers for its generals, and from them produced Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Hancock, and the other great commanders—graduates of West Point with but very few exceptions—who finally put down the rebellion.

The New English. By T. L. Kington Oliphant of Balliol College. Macmillan & Co. 1886.

MR. OLIPHANT'S 'New English' is a record of the rise of new words in English literature. He takes the date of the first well-formed specimen of the new English to be 1303. He begins with Friar Michael of Kildare, his printed pieces dating shortly after 1300, and enumerates the new words and phrases which occur in them, pointing out that such and such are from the French, this and that from the Scandinavian, and many from the Anglo-Saxon. Then he takes up another book and deals with it in the same way, making good speed through scores of little-known authors to Chaucer, to Shakspere, and at last to Morris and the last revised Bible of our own day. A verbal index is added, containing something like 20,000 words and many more than 20,000 references. 'New English' will serve as a compendious historical dictionary till the great work of the Philological Society shall be available.

One who reads Dr. F. Hall's handling of Bishop Coxe's English philology in the Nation of March 3 might be interested in the expression "is being built." Dr. Hall gives it a respectable age: he has found it as early as 1769. A look for it in Oliphant shows examples in 1447–48. "You was" comes up in 1699, in Bentley, king of scholars; great, too, in idiomatic English. It was current afterwards for a hundred years. The South English abuse of h is an interesting puzzle in its cause and age. Oliphant finds it first in Miss Hawkins's novel, 'The Countess and Gertrude,' published in 1811; a rustic talks of a "ot loaf," and a lady's maid of a "himpeeral" (imperial). These examples favor the view that the dropping of h is the old natural weakening; the adding, an affectation in high life below stairs. Persons often wonder when and where our queer spellings started into use. A look at could in Oliphant refers to the records (1440–1450) of Coldingham Priory, vol. i. "There is a startling change in p. 160," he says; "the old cude (potuit) is written culde, from a false analogy with shulde and wulde." In Bishop Hall (1598) the old Teutonic rime is first "confused with the Greek rhythm, and becomes rhyme, p. 10; this absurd spelling ought never to be used in our time." Besides single words and forms, much care has been taken to note phrases, especially proverbs, and other expressions which embody the habits of thought or record the customs of each age, and everything which throws light on the pronunciation either of English or foreign words.

Thus much about the book considered as a sort of dictionary. Its distinctive feature and eminent merit is the exhibition of numbers of words and phrases together as they are found together in books. This presents us with the materials for the study of the language of any book, of any author, or of any age. About 250 writers are examined before Shakspere's time, and 100 more to our day.

These writers have been selected on the ground of their importance in the history of the language; many of them are of small importance or none at all, as literature. Comic and colloquial authors are best for this purpose. Little notice is taken of Spenser and Milton, much notice of Udall and Still. But the most elaborate study is made of Shakspere and Chaucer. Shakspere's plays are taken up one by one, and each has as much space as a whole book usually gets. The whole is stuffed full of curious facts, and suggests still more curious questions. In "Love's Labour Lost," to begin with, the French caporal figures as a corporal; the law term escheat becomes cheat, the people's notion of a lawyer's function; epithet appears for epitheton; a new kind of time-piece, the watch, takes the place of the dial; the adjective spruce (from Prussia) testifies to the smart dress from Prussia which pleased the Londoners; and so on. Some eighty words and phrases are mentioned in this play, a great part being phrases or loose compounds. The order in which the plays are treated does not agree with that in which it is generally supposed that they were written—perhaps Mr. Oliphant has strong opinions in favor of the order he has adopted. But his discussions do not depend upon the order as much as one might suppose, for most of his examples occur but once in all of Shakspere. At least, suspecting this, we turned up the words in "Romeo and Juliet," and found it to be so there. So that, in addition to the other matters, we have material for examining Shakspere's hapax legomena.

Mr. Oliphant is an Oxford man, and well up in the latest scientific knowledge of English as it appears in the works of Prof. Skeat and Dr. Murray. This particular kind of work is all his own. In 1873 he published 'Standard English,' a sketch of the sources of English, traced in the same method which he uses here, but through fewer books. That must have cost him several years of labor. He has now spent a dozen more years in enlarging it. In 1878 'Old and Middle English' appeared, and now we have the completion in 'New English.' Such a work must be incomplete, from the nature of the case. One man cannot read everything. Dr. Murray's readers have gone over thousands of volumes to Mr. Oliphant's hundreds. But, such as it is, all students of English will be glad to get it and must have it; for none of them will venture to decide questions of English etymology or historical grammar without consulting him.

Mr. Oliphant has a lively liking for pure English, and plenty of sharp thrusts for modern debasers of it. The Johnsonese of the press hurts him worst. He is most courteous to American scholars, and bountiful in praise of them; but he cannot see how they can write honor, etc., instead of the old honour. It pares down history, robs us of all our Norman glories. The old word "should abide with us in the shape it has always hitherto worn." This looks as if Mr. Oliphant had not noticed that of all the old words of this sort, honor most frequently appears in the old books with -or. Picking a place in Shakspere by the concordance where the word occurs frequently, "Coriolanus," ii, and turning to the First Folio, we find honor fifteen times, and no honour. Another trial, "Measure for Measure," ii, 1, gives honor nine times and honour eight, most of them being the address Your Honour, with one honorable. Looking to the analogy of the language, as our verb honor and the noun honor have the accent on the same syllable, they are naturally spelled alike, and like French hon'orer', rather than honneur'.

The Practical Horse Keeper. By George Fleming, LL.D., F.R.C.V.S. Cassell & Co.

Mr. FLEMING says in his preface: "This little work is intended as a guide to those who have to do with horses, either as owners, purchasers, breeders, trainers, managers, or attendants, and whose experience has not been so extensive as those on whose knowledge it is based." As such and for Great Britain it is a desirable manual. Its value for this country is largely diminished by reason of the different uses to which horses are put here, necessitating, for general purposes, especially those outside of hauling heavy loads, animals of quite other types than any in common use in England. For instance, "the hunter" and "the hack," probably the best-known and commonest types of English horses, would not be recognized by these names in this country except in the localities where English manners, customs, and nomenclature are most affected, and really do not exist as a class. The "tradesman's horse," a variety treated of by Mr. Fleming, would also be a hard animal to find here, perhaps because there are either so few or so many "tradesmen." Again, the horse which in this country takes the place of the English hack, and we may almost say, hunter also, is the light driving horse for road or general utility purposes; and he, from his different conditions of use and treatment, is broken, bitted, harnessed, driven, and cared for in a manner radically different from any taught in Mr. Fleming's or any other English book, and infinitely better for the end desired.

Consequently, the parts of Mr. Fleming's work devoted to the hack, the hunter, "purchasing at fairs," breaking, training, and feeding, while undoubtedly excellent for the British Isles, are of but limited utility elsewhere, and much inferior for home application to several American treatises on the same subject. The latter portion of Mr. Fleming's book, however, has no such limitations of usefulness. It treats concisely and admirably of the common infirmities of horseflesh, and gives plain and sensible instructions for their relief. The chapter on "Nursing" is especially to be commended, and Mr. Fleming says, what can be proved by every humane man who has had horses in his charge, that "when a horse is sick, or ill from injury, recovery is much accelerated by careful and sympathetic nursing. However indifferent a horse may be to caressing or kind attention during health, when ill he certainly appreciates them," etc.

The Fall of Maximilian's Empire, as seen from a United States Gunboat. By Seaton Schroeder, Lieutenant, U. S. N. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1887. Pp. 130.

LIEUT. SCHROEDER has written very pleasantly and intelligently, and withal modestly, of the doings of the United States steamer Tacony in Vera Cruz harbor during the spring and summer of 1867. His narrative is but lightly and incidentally connected with the important movements going on in the interior, and he makes no pretence of being able to see as far as Queretaro from the sea-board. It should be said, however, that nearly all his allusions to the course and causes of events in those closing struggles show a good acquaintance with the facts. The Orizaba conference, leading to Maximilian's fatal decision to return, is rather unsatisfactorily sketched, and the amount of revenue promised the Emperor considerably exaggerated. We are not pleased with the author's spelling of the name of Mexico's great hero-traitor. It is true, we believe, that Santa Ana was the original form, but it has been entirely superseded by the common orthography in the writings of Mexicans themselves, and to return to it now seems almost affectation. The tombstone in the Gaudalupe "pantheon" has the two n's. If any variation from the ordinary English spelling of Mexican names had to be attempted, we think a juster change might have been made in the case of Uloa, Ulua being decidedly preferable. The "Bird's-eye View of Vera Cruz" (p. 93) is correct for 1867, but not for 1887; the walls of the city having been demolished long since.

Roberts Brothers'
NEW BOOKS.

The Egoist.

A Novel. By GEORGE MEREDITH, author of 'Richard Feverel,' 'Evan Harrington,' 'Harry Richmond,' 'Sandra Belloni,' 'Rhoda Fleming,' 'Vittoria,' and 'Diana of the Crossways,' being the eighth in our new uniform 12mo edition, bound in English cloth, uncut. Price, $2.

Mr. Meredith's novels are an intellectual tonic. They are great, and, indeed, we may say they are the only novels of any living author which deserve to be called great. They will take the same high and permanent rank that is assigned to the works of George Eliot and George Sand.—Boston Traveller.

Cathedral Days.

A Tour through Southern England. By ANNA BOWMAN DODD. With 23 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs by E. Eldon Deane. 12mo. Cloth, $2.

This is the record of a trip in places little frequented by tourists, told with so much fascination of style that the reader seems to share the delightful journey with the travellers. One of our foremost critics says of Mrs. Dodd: "She is, of all the women I know, the most thoroughly educated and accomplished—one of our ablest writers on literature, art, music, etc. I have looked over her descriptive record of a tour among the Southern Cathedral towns of England, and find it very charming."

Some Chinese Ghosts.

By LAFCADIO HEARN.

CONTENTS.—The Soul of the Great Bell; The Story of Ming-y; The Legend of Tchi-Nu; The Return of Yen-Tchin-King; The Tradition of the Tea Plant; The Tale of the Porcelain-God. 16mo. Cloth, $1.00.

'Some Chinese Ghosts,' by Lafcadio Hearn, is a collection of half a dozen legends culled from the realm of Cathayan story. The style has such grace and finish that it is charming, and the imagination is fresh and wholly original. This little gem is sure to have a permanent setting in American literature.

Sonnets in Shadow.

By ARLO BATES, author of 'Berries of the Brier.' 16mo, Cloth, $1.00.

Mr. Bates's first poetical volume, 'Berries of the Brier,' though not long since published, is entirely out of print. 'Sonnets in Shadow,' being an in memoriam, strikes a tender chord, but it is the plaint of a soul which has thoughts worth the telling.

Sold by all booksellers. Mailed, postpaid by the publishers, ROBERTS BROTHERS, Boston.

VOL. XLIV.—NO. 1134. THURSDAY, MARCH 24, 1887. PRICE 10 CENTS.

THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS.

NOW COMPLETE.

THE GREVILLE MEMOIRS consists of Three Parts, or Five Volumes, as follows:

PART FIRST.

A Journal of the Reigns of King George IV. and King William IV. By the late Charles Greville, Clerk of the Council to those Sovereigns. Edited by Henry Reeve, Registrar of the Privy Council. Two vols., 12mo, cloth. Price, $4.

"Since the publication of Horace Walpole's Letters, no book of greater historical interest has seen the light than the 'Greville Memoirs.' It throws a curious and, we may almost say, a terrible light on the conduct and character of the public men in England under the reigns of George IV. and William IV. Its descriptions of those kings and their kinsfolk are never likely to be forgotten."—New York Times.

PART SECOND.

A Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, from 1837 to 1852. The 'Greville Memoirs,' Second Part. By the late Charles Greville, Clerk of the Council. Uniform with Part First. Two vols., 12mo, cloth. Price, $4.

"Mr. Greville's Diary is one of the most important contributions which have ever been made to the political history of the middle of the nineteenth century. He is a graphic and powerful writer; and his usual habit of making the record while the impression of the events was fresh upon his mind, gives his sketches of persons and [illegible]s, and his accounts of conversations, great vividness. The volumes will be read with as much interest for their [illegible]es of social life as for their political value."—London Daily News.

PART THIRD (Just Published).

A Journal of the Reign of Queen Victoria, from 1852 to 1860. By the late Charles Greville, Clerk of the Council. Being third and concluding part of the 'Greville Memoirs.' One vol, 12mo, cloth. Price, $2.

The volume now published, in addition to personal anecdotes, deals with many important events, such, for instance, as the reëstablishment of the French Empire, the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny, and the Italian War.

THE WORK COMPLETE, in Five Volumes, Put Up in a Box. PRICE, $10.00.

HOMŒOPATHY.—IF TAKEN IN time a properly selected homœopathic remedy generally cures so rapidly and easily that people are unwilling often to give it due credit; if it were to nauseate them, or make some sort of an internal commotion, it might receive knowledge and consent sooner, but for a disease to simply fade away into forgetfulness is too much for human credence at times. "There was nothing ailed me after all" is frequently heard after taking homœopathic medicines. We will give, or send, free a copy of our little "Medical Index," which is a collection of valuable homœopathic prescriptions for ailment not severe enough to require a physician. BOERICKE & TAFEL,

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 24, 1887.

The Week.

THE President's selections for the Inter-State Commerce Commission have been marked by extraordinary diligence. The law excludes from the Commission all persons "in the employ of or holding any official relation to any common carrier subject to the provision of this act, or owning stock or bonds thereof, or who are in any way pecuniarily interested therein." This provision not only excludes every "railroad man," properly so called, in the country, but it necessarily excludes all men who have succeeded in life sufficiently to hold railroad investments, as they would, therefore, have to qualify for the office by more or less derangement of their private affairs, even if they were willing to undertake duties so onerous for a salary of $7,500. The Commission is, in fact, wholly composed of lawyers, but, with the possible exception of Mr. Morrison and Judge Schoonmaker, they are very familiar with railroad management as well as railroad law. Judge Cooley, who goes in for the long term of six years, has been engaged in a great deal of railroad litigation, and is at the present moment receiver of the Wabash system of railroads. Mr. Walker of Vermont has had a very large railroad practice, and enjoys the distinction of having done his best to free Vermont from the domination of a very corrupt railroad ring. Mr. Bragg has been President of the Alabama State Railroad Commission. It is characteristic of President Cleveland's painstaking ways, in the discharge of duties of this sort, that he did not appoint him until he had previously examined the records of this commission so as to satisfy himself as to the justice or injustice of charges which had been made against its manner of doing duty Of Judge Schoonmaker, the member from this State, it may be said that he has every qualification except actual experience of railroad management. As to character and ability, no member of the New York bar stands higher, and he has shown his warm adhesion to all progressive tendencies in public administration by faithful and self-sacrificing service during the past four years as a member of the State Civil Service Commission. Mr. Morrison is best known through his career in Congress and his ineffectual but persistent efforts to effect a revision of the tariff.

What is most remarkable about the Commission is, however, not so much the quality of the members, high as this is, as the evident indifference to political considerations with which they have been chosen. The President was bound by the law to divide them between the two political parties. The act provides that not more than three shall belong to the same political party. But it is hardly necessary to say that had the President consulted party managers in making the appointments, or sought to make what they would consider party "capital" out of the composition of the Board, not one of the gentlemen he has chosen would have found a place on it We doubt whether any one who knows anything of politics will question this statement, and, if accurate, President Cleveland has done a new thing in American administration, and one of which the effects will be permanent as well as important. We believe every member of the Commission has been selected without the aid of the "pulls" which have long formed so important a feature in our political machinery.

The St. Louis Globe-Democrat publishes a very notable editorial article regarding the next Presidential campaign, apropos of the recent interview with Senator Edmunds. The Globe-Democrat agrees with Mr. Edmunds in the opinion that the Democrats will renominate Mr. Cleveland. It holds that the few Democratic newspapers, like the New York World and Louisville Courier-Journal, which favor some other candidate, "voice the views of a mere handful of malcontents, whose wishes would not have the slightest influence in directing the party choice, and whose opposition would not be a feather-weight in a canvass against the party candidate." It warns the foolish Republicans "who may find a mild variety of amusement in conjuring up in their minds such opposition to the President in his own party as could defeat him for renomination," that they are the victims of a delusion, and says that "wise Republicans will realize now that Cleveland will be the standard-bearer of the Democratic party a year hence, and be governed accordingly." The question for Republicans, therefore, is whether they can defeat Cleveland in 1888, and this is the Globe-Democrat's answer: "We believe they can. But they certainly cannot do so if they again confront him with the candidate which they put in the field in 1884." Such a confession would be significant in any Republican paper, but it derives added force in this case from the two facts that Mr. Blaine's friends pronounce him peculiarly strong in the West, and that the St. Louis Globe-Democrat is perhaps the best representative of Western Republicanism.

A Republican Club has recently been started in the westernmost county of Massachusetts, and the incident derives its importance from the fact that it is hoped to make this club a model for many others throughout the State, and that it is the beginning of a movement which appears to engage the chief energies of the party managers. The basis of this movement is the theory that the only thing needed to restore the Republican party in Massachusetts to its ancient preëminence is "organization." The constitution of the Berkshire Club pledges loyalty in national, State, and county contests to the principles of the National Republican party, "as declared by the national platforms, and established by the illustrious history of that party from 1860 to 1886," while it declares for "independence of all parties, rings, and political machines in municipal, town, and school elections." The most obvious comment upon this is the absurdity of making so broad a distinction between county and municipal, town, or school elections. The management of county affairs has no more to do with "the principles of the National Republican party" or of the National Democratic party than the management of town or city affairs, and "county rings" have often set up political machines of the worst type. It is therefore ridiculous to give members of the Club "the unquestioned right to vote in accordance with their individual preferences" in municipal, town, and school elections, but to insist upon their support of regular Republican nominations in national, State, and county contests, unless a majority of all the members fail to endorse these nominations. To say that a Republican shall have "the unquestioned right" to vote for a Democrat as Selectman or School Committeeman of his town if he thinks the Democrat the best candidate, but that he must forfeit his membership of the Club for a year if he supports a Democrat whom he thinks the best candidate for County Commissioner, is so ridiculous that it seems odd that anybody should have the assurance to formulate such a rule.

The first colored State fair in Florida, which was held at Jacksonville last week, furnished striking evidence both of the rapid progress which the race is making and of the growth in harmonious relations between the whites and blacks. The range of exhibits was very extensive, and the patronage included hundreds of white spectators every day. Better than the signs of progress in agriculture and the mechanical arts was the evidence furnished of progress in education and the finer arts. Mr. Albert J. Russell, Superintendent of Public Instruction in Florida for some years past, delivered the opening address, and congratulated his hearers upon the fact that the colored people had just reported the raising of funds which assured the establishment of an industrial school for the training of their boys and girls in a knowledge of tools and the trades. It will thus be seen that the negroes are not only improving to the full the educational advantages offered by the public schools, but are becoming so prosperous that they can establish an industrial school of their own. This is only one of many signs of progress in Florida, which is fast developing a common-school system worthy to rank with that of any Northern State. A letter from Mr. Russell announces that his forthcoming report for last year will show an increase in the number of schools from 1,504 in 1884 to 1,724 in 1885, and 1,832 in 1886, with a corresponding increase in the enrolment and average attendance. "Best of all," he concludes, with that self-reliant spirit which is now so rapidly growing in the South, "the people of Florida are doing it all themselves, without any aid from any outside source."

The discovery that Mr. Bayles, the new President of the Board of Health, at one time belonged to the Knights of Labor, is not a very important one. We have heard of many sensible and intelligent men and women, not manual laborers properly so called, either joining the order or watching it with sympathetic eyes a year or two ago. They thought it was, as its Constitution and by-laws seemed to indicate, a social-science association, or an association for mutual improvement, and for the promotion of reformatory legislation. Nobody then dreamed that it was to be the promoter of such insane and childish performances as the sympathetic strikes; or that its chiefs were to declare strikes to be "war," and to justify the use of the bludgeon, the pistol, and the torch, not only against employers, but against poor men who refused to join the order and sought to manage their own lives in their own way; or were to try, almost without disguise, to substitute the despotic rule of the Order for the National Government, and to blackguard and threaten the officers of the law for seeking to restrain or punish their disorders. Neither Mr. Bayles nor any other good citizen ever knowingly joined an organization of this sort, or remained in it after it had shown itself simply an elongation and amplification of the Molly Maguires of Pennsylvania. Nothing more discreditable, too, has ever issued from the pen of a Christian minister than Cardinal Gibbons's sophistical and disingenuous description of the Order addressed to the Holy See. There is hardly a paragraph in his account of the Knights which does not contain either a suppression of the truth or a suggestion of falsehood.

Mr. Bayles recently published a pamphlet entitled 'The Shop Council,' which is, on the whole, we think, so far as our observation goes, the most rational, and practical, and persuasive of all the suggestions for averting strikes which the recent labor troubles have called forth. It shows clearly enough that he never could have been a Knight of Labor in good standing with Powderly or Quinn. He proposes the establishment in each shop or factory of a council, composed both of the employers and employed, to form a permanent tribunal for the discussion, though not for the absolute settlement, of all grievances and complaints, in the belief, which is undoubtedly well founded, that nine out of ten labor disputes are the result of misunderstanding or of imperfect knowledge of the facts on one side or other. Mere trifles become the cause of great disturbance, loss, and suffering, by the habit on the part of workingmen of running with them to the paid officers of the trades-unions, who not only have no direct interest in settling the quarrel amicably, but actually have a direct interest in magnifying it, both for the purpose of showing their power and of justifying their salaries.

The extraordinary act which the President inadvertently approved, providing for the exclusion from the United States of aliens under contract to perform labor, was the product of Mr. O'Neill's Labor Committee, and is now said to be embarrassing the Treasury Department a good deal. It is an addendum to the act of February 26, 1885, which forbade the importation of aliens under labor contracts, except personal and domestic servants, professional actors, artists, lecturers, and singers, or workmen to be employed in any new industry not already established in the United States. That act imposed heavy penalties for its violation on the employer making such a contract, or the master of the vessel "knowingly" bringing the aliens over; but the prosecution was left to the United States District Attorney. The last act goes further, and charges the Treasury with the duty of seeing to the execution of the law, by sending agents on board incoming passenger vessels to overhaul the passengers, and see whether any of them come under its provisions, and, when any such are found, to send them back at the expense of the owners of the vessel. If the owners refuse to pay, the ship is to be excluded from the ports of the United States, and the expenses are to constitute a lien on the ship. Of course, if such agents or commissioners are to accomplish anything, they must be armed with inquisitorial powers of an extraordinary nature, and capable of monstrous abuse. They would have it in their power arbitrarily and on their own dictum to exclude anybody they pleased from the country, and to inflict ruinous fines on any ship-owner they might select for persecution. The Treasury, it is said, hardly knows how to make regulations for the execution of such a law.

It is not to be denied that the practice, in which some corporations have been indulging during the past few years, of importing large bodies of the lowest class of European laborers, Hungarians, Poles, and Italians, only partially civilized, and ignorant not only of the laws but of the language of the country, and with very low standards of living, is one which needed some restraint. The serious troubles, both industrial and political, which these importations have been causing during the past year, have made a deep impression on the public mind. A measure, therefore, directed against importations en masse of unskilled and ignorant labor, and fortified with some tests of character or education, would, we think, meet with general approval. But such a measure would of course have to be carefully drawn, and to contain ample provision against abuse and against arbitrary interference with legitimate intercourse or trade. The present bills contain nothing of the kind. They simply strike blindly at any man, no matter his quality, who makes a contract in Europe to come here to "perform labor," and contains not one word looking to the exclusion of the "foreign devils," to use the Chinese phrase, who come here not to labor, but to "raise hell," by throwing bombs, or by getting up murder associations, or opening rumholes, or publishing anarchical newspapers. As the law now stands, Most, or Braunschweiger, or Owney Geoghegan, or Tom Gould could enter the United States without any difficulty whatever, while the most respectable and industrious German cabinet-maker, or Irish mason, or bricklayer, or farmer, who had secured his future or that of his family by an agreement with an employer before starting, would run the risk of being sent back in the ship by which he had arrived.

Emigration from the United Kingdom is still on the increase, 236,104 persons having sailed from the various ports in 1886 against only 210,848 in 1885. About 60 per cent. of the whole number were Englishmen, and about 10 per cent. more were Scotch, so that the 61,411 Irish composed only about 30 per cent. of the whole number, whereas thirty or forty years ago Ireland contributed from 60 to 70 per cent. of all. The change in proportion is not due so much to the fact that Irishmen emigrate less than they did, as to the fact that Englishmen emigrate much more. The United States continue to attract about two-thirds of the whole number, despite all the efforts of the Canadian authorities; and Australia and New Zealand come next, almost as large a number seeking homes in the latter colonies in 1886 as in the years of the gold discoveries. Statistics covering a long period show that the emigration from each part of the United Kingdom has certain persistent features. Thus the Irish woman is as ready to quit her country as her father or brother, while there are two men for one woman among English and Scotch emigrants. On the other hand, the English or Scotch emigrant more often goes to his new home with his children than the Irishman, only about 11 per cent. of all Irish emigrants being children, against about 18 per cent. among the English, and more than 20 per cent. among the Scotch. The back-flowing stream of immigration into Great Britain is much larger than is generally supposed, from 80,000 to 90,000 persons annually going from the United States to England, many of whom, doubtless, are people who found that they were unfitted for life in a new country.

The last report of the Registrar-General in England furnishes fresh evidence of the steady progress which is making in the prolongation of human life, especially through the influence of the sanitary measures adopted during the last thirty years. The death-rate for 1886 was 19.3 per thousand of the population, which was lower than that recorded in any previous year since the registration system was started in 1837, with the two exceptions of 19 in 1885 and 18.9 in 1881. The mean annual death-rate for the six years since 1880 did not exceed 19.3, which was 2.1 below the mean rate between 1870 and 1880. This means that 339,000 persons in England and Wales were alive at the end of those six years who would have been dead if the rate of mortality which prevailed between 1870 and 1880 had been maintained. The reduction is largely accounted for by the falling-off in the deaths from the principal zymotic or "filth diseases," which have sunk from an annual rate of 4.15 per thousand between 1860 and 1870, to 3.40 between 1870 and 1880, and only 2.43 since 1880. The proportion of infant mortality has also been perceptibly diminished, falling from an average of 149 per 1,000 births during the ten years preceding 1880 to 141 in the six years since then. The birth-rate itself last year was only 32.4, which is lower than in any previous year since 1848, and the natural increase of population by the excess of births over deaths accordingly shows a decline from 375,922 in 1884 and 371,520 in 1885 to 366,138 in 1886.

The latest attempt to solve the labor problem is that of Mr. W. H. Mallock, who has begun some articles on it in the Fortnightly Review. The first one states the problem, which is, how to satisfy people who have embraced the doctrine of Karl Marx, viz., that all value is given by labor, and that, therefore, laborers are entitled to everything into the production of which labor enters, including the instruments of labor, land, machinery, and mines. In other words, they demand that everything called property should be taken possession of by the Government, and managed for the common benefit. Mr. Mallock is to give the answer to this question in the next number of the magazine, and it will probably be interesting as a bit of speculation in sociology by a lively writer, but we have no expectation that he will throw new light on the subject. There is no way of refuting a man who maintains that every commodity derives all its value from labor, although he sees every day much labor expended on things which have no value. It is desire for things which gives them value. Everybody has more or less experience of this, and a man on whom this experience makes no impression is not likely to be influenced by argument. The part which successful capitalists and investors play in modern society is that of distinguishing the things to which labor will give value from the things to which it will not give value. The men who are skilful in this make fortunes. The men who are not, go into bankruptcy, or remain laborers. If the former were more numerous, there would be fewer unsuccessful enterprises, and less wasted labor, and the whole human race would be far better off. As a matter of fact they are lamentably scarce. The history of industry is in large part the history of mistakes in the selection of things on which to expend labor.

To the question how we are going to satisfy the Socialists, either of the Karl Marx or any other school, the answer must always be that we cannot satisfy them. There is not much use in arguing with them, because they are generally poor and unsuccessful men, who have a powerful personal bias in favor of the theory that they have been in some manner cheated or robbed by the successful. The only sure way to enlighten them would be to try the experiment of turning some nation into a joint-stock company, and handing over all the property of individuals to be managed by boards of politicians for the common benefit. But no nation will ever be willing to try an experiment so costly in order to convince anybody that his theories are false. It would involve ruin if it failed, and, in fact, the mere attempt to try it would be productive of as much convulsion as a civil war. What, then, is the modern world going to do about Socialism? Simply bear with it as patiently as it can; bear with it as we bear with unpreventable disease in men, animals, and plants. We must argue with Socialists where argument seems likely to be effective, and resist them where argument is of no use, and go on as well as we can making the world a more and more comfortable place for good men to live in, and a more and more uncomfortable place for cranks and criminals to cut capers in. To the patient, industrious, law-abiding, just, and self-reliant, society owes every help which science or art or statesmanship can suggest. To the unreasonable and obstreperous it owes nothing but such restraint as may be necessary to keep them from harming themselves or their neighbors.

The "Incorporated Society of Authors" has begun a series of conferences in London, at which are to be debated practical questions affecting the interests of writers, the subject of the recent first conference being the rather wide topic of "The Maintenance of Literary Property," on which a paper was read by Mr. Walter Besant. On this occasion the chair was taken by Lord Lytton, who said that the results which might be produced by such a society could scarcely be overestimated. He did not think that the profession of literature at the present day could be regarded on the whole as unprosperous or unremunerative, yet the individual provider of literature found himself in a very disadvantageous position as regards the distributor, compared to any other producer and distributor. The farmer, the manufacturer, knew the commercial value of the article he produced, and knew the conditions of the market in which it was sold. The author had none of those advantages. Mr. Besant's main contention was that the relations between author and publisher are at the present moment most unsatisfactory. They have always been strained; the increase and development of the literary trade only make this strain felt more keenly; there is no workman so discontented with his pay as the author; there is no one so jealous and suspicious of his treatment; there is no kind of work which has caused so much disappointment as literary work. The Society of Authors was founded partly in the hope of finding some remedy for this state of things. The question put before them for the first time now was, "What proportion of the results from the sale of a book should be retained by the publisher in equity in payment of his services for producing a book in the publishing of which there is no risk?" There were now a great number of writers about whose books there was no risk. It must be remembered that as administrators, or distributors and collectors, as agents, in short, the publishers have a perfect right to payment for their services. Many disagreements between author and publisher would never occur if this very simple rule were borne in mind. Men do not work for each other without payment. Much less do they pay heavy rents, keep travellers, clerks, and accountants simply in order to do good to each other. Mr. Besant discussed the various systems employed in publishing, such as that of half-profits, royalties, and commission. His cure for the faults of the half-profits system was "no more secret profits, and the auditing of all accounts." The improvement of the royalty plan which he desired was apparently to treble the amount of royalty, which has the merit of being simple.

Of course, much was said about copyright. Lord Lytton said that the Society hoped to work with the publishing and book-selling trade in securing an international copyright all the world over. At present their chief difficulty lay with the United States, where piracy was so profitable. With the increase, however, of a literature of their own, the American publishers would find the piracy not so profitable, and there was every reason to hope that authors would soon secure their rights in their own property on both sides of the Atlantic. Mr. Bryce, M. P., said that they had already obtained protection throughout all English-speaking nations, except the United States of America; and Mr. Besant concluded his paper with a description of a dream in which he imagined the more than 400,000,000 English-speaking people having one common copyright law. This, he said, was the aim of the English Society of Authors. At the next two conferences Mr. Edmund Gosse will speak on "The Profession of Author," and Mr. John Hollingshead on "Dramatic Rights and Property." All these questions are of living interest in this country, and it might be useful to have an American organization to act in concert with the London Society for mutual benefit in all matters of common interest. Perhaps for dealing with the question of copyright nothing further is required than what we have already; but as to other matters something may be done, if our authors are not in a happier state than their English brethren. The Authors' Club might hesitate, perhaps wisely, to concern itself as a club with matters of business, but it could fitly afford a nidus for a society such as we suggest.

One of the oddest scandals which have occurred in politics for a long time, is the charge brought against the Corporation of the City of London of having spent a large sum from the municipal funds, something like $250,000, in getting up bogus meetings to protest against the bill introduced by Sir William Harcourt to reform the municipal government. At these meetings everybody, including the audiences, was hired. Indeed, the "hire of the audience" was set down as an item in the accounts. Of course these hired audiences were small. One, composed of "indignant London Irishmen," consisted of only five persons, and was held in a tavern. In some cases the hired men were sent to capture Liberal meetings, and if necessary "storm" their platforms. Among them on all occasions a small party of men is set down as "chuckers-out," who performed the functions assigned in this country to "bouncers," and were doubtless men of similar build and character. If it be asked how these bogus meetings were made to serve any purpose in the agitation, the answer is, we regret to say, that reporters who had access to the leading metropolitan journals were found ready to desecrate their calling by getting accounts of them published as "imposing demonstrations," or "crowded and enthusiastic meetings," at which the applause was described as frantic. The charges have been brought up in the House of Commons by Mr. Labouchere, and he offers to prove them to the letter, having the accounts and other documents in his possession.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, March 16, to TUESDAY, March 22, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has appointed on the Commission created by the Inter-State Commerce Law: Thomas M. Cooley of Michigan, for the term of six years; William R. Morrison of Illinois, for the term of five years; Augustus Schoonmaker of New York, for the term of four years; Aldace F. Walker of Vermont, for the term of three years; Walter L. Bragg of Alabama, for the term of two years.

The President spent his fiftieth birthday, March 10, quietly at the White House. Speaker Carlisle and most of the Senators and members of Congress in Washington called and offered their congratulations.

Mr. C. H. J. Taylor, a colored man, has been appointed by the President to be Minister to Liberia, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Mr. Hopkins.

A general order has been issued by the War Department to discontinue the firing of a morning and evening gun at military posts, except at the United States Military Academy, Fort Monroe, Virginia, and Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, because the supply of powder remaining at the close of the war of the Rebellion, which has been used for this purpose, has been exhausted.

Application has been made to the Treasury Department for the free entry at San Francisco of a joss for a joss house in that city. It is 150 feet long and is made of wood, paper, tinsel, and metal. The Department has decided that it is not entitled to free entry, as "philosophical and scientific apparatus, statuary, paintings, drawings," etc., or as "regalia and gems, statues, and specimens of sculpture, where specially imported in good faith for the use of any society incorporated or established for religious purposes."

The captain of a Gloucester, Mass., schooner, which was seized last summer by the Collector at Port Hawkesbury, C. B., for alleged violation of the customs laws, and held until a fine of $400 was paid, has received word from the Dominion Government that the fine will be remitted.

The Trade Convention between Cuba and Porto Rico on the one hand, and the United States on the other, which was to have terminated in April, has been prolonged to November, in order to give time for the negotiation of a treaty.

The General Assembly of Virginia met on March 16 in extra session. Its especial duty is to settle the vexed question of the State's debt. Gov. Lee recommended the appointment of a commission on the part of the State to meet a similar commission on the part of the bondholders, to make a true presentation of the revenues and resources of the State, and to determine how much the State can pay.

The Democratic Congressional Convention to nominate a successor to Congressman Reagan of Texas, who has been elected Senator, on the 272d ballot chose William H. Martin.

The Republican State Convention of Rhode Island on the 18th nominated all the incumbents of the State offices for the party candidates, namely: For Governor, George Peabody Wetmore; Lieutenant-Governor, Lucius C. Darling; Secretary of State, Joshua M. Addeman; Attorney-General, Edwin Metcalf; General Treasurer, Samuel Clark; State Auditor, Samuel H. Cross.

The bill fixing the annual salary of the Governor of Ohio at $8,000 instead of $4,000, as now, has become a law, to take effect after the next election.

A high-license bill in the New Jersey Legislature was so amended as to reduce the fees to a low-license system. The purpose of the measure has thus been defeated. The movement for submitting a prohibitory amendment in Nebraska has been defeated in the lower branch of the Legislature, receiving only a small majority where two-thirds were necessary.

The Legislature of Maine has abolished capital punishment after an experiment with it of several years. The condemned are to be kept in close and solitary confinement, and no pardoning power is left to the Governor and Council, unless the convict is afterwards proved innocent.

The Richmond Hotel at Buffalo was burned on March 18. The fire was discovered at 3:30 o'clock in the morning, and the house was filled with people. Ten persons were killed—burned to death, or so severely injured that they died within a few days; four others are missing, who are supposed to have perished, and as many as twenty-five received more or less severe injuries. Two days before this fire the Miller & Greiner block of buildings was burned, and there have within a week been three smaller fires in Buffalo. The total losses are little less than $1,000,000. In East Buffalo, on the 20th, a small hotel was burned, from which several persons escaped just in time to save themselves. A fire at the Chautauqua (N. Y.) Assembly grounds, on March 21, destroyed more than fifty buildings, including several boarding-houses and several of the handsomest cottages. The total loss exceeds $100,000. The fire was caused by a defective flue. On the same night the Grand Central Theatre, at Troy, N. Y., and the Warsaw (N. Y.) Salt Company's Works were burned.

The succession of fatal fires in hotels has caused a bill to be prepared, which will be introduced in the New York Legislature, to require every hotel to have a rope in every room above the ground floor, so fastened as to hold a weight of 400 pounds, and coiled in plain sight by a window, so that any person will be sure to see it.

The important addition is to be made this year to the summer instruction offered by Harvard College of a course in physical training for teachers of both sexes. It will consist of lectures, examinations, and exercises, and the various opportunities offered by the University will be opened to the students under the direction of Dr. Sargent.

Mr. Robert Garrett of Baltimore, an alumnus of Princeton College, has given $8,000 towards the new art school of Princeton. This will permit the work on the building to begin. Mr. Robert Garrett's brother, Mr. T. Harrison Garrett, gave $7,000 towards the same purpose last spring.

Subscriptions have been opened in Brooklyn towards the erection of a monument to Henry Ward Beecher, and for the building of a free public library to his memory.

A mass meeting was held at the Cooper Union March 21, called by the Municipal Council of the Irish National League, to protest against proposed coercion for Ireland by the English Government.

Walter E. Lawton, a dealer in fertilizers, has disappeared from New York, and left obligations to the amount of nearly $1,000,000.

The snow blockade on the Canadian Pacific Railroad has been raised, and the line is open to the Pacific Coast.

A flood in the upper Missouri River on March 18 washed away a part of the high trestle of the Northern Pacific Railroad at Mandan, Dak. The bridge and the telegraph poles were swept away, and for a number of days the town was cut off from communication in any way with Bismarck, which is on the east side of the river. At one point, where the river is usually three quarters of a mile wide, it became more than six miles wide. The ice from a broken gorge struck the railroad warehouse at Bismarck, which is one of the largest in the world, and drove it against the bluffs. A meadow of 6,000 acres was inundated, and ice was driven over it by the current at the speed of ten miles an hour. The water rose a foot higher than the highest previous water-mark. Traffic has been delayed on the Northern Pacific since March 17. It is expected that passengers and mail will be transferred by boats on March 24. Conflicting reports have been made of the loss of life by the washing away of houses near the river bank.

An earthquake shock was felt at Summerville, S. C., on March 18, which was more severe than any since last summer.

FOREIGN.

The celebration of Emperor William's ninetieth birthday (March 22) was extended over two days. On the afternoon of the 21st he gave a special audience to foreign envoys. Every European court had sent a royal representative. Afterwards there was a state dinner to the royal guests. In the evening more than 3,000 students, bearing flags, banners, and torches, formed in procession and marched to the palace. The Emperor and Empress appeared at a window and bowed. The students called for cheers for the Emperor, "for the victorious commander in glorious battles, for the beloved father of his country, for the author of the union of the German races, for the defender of the frontiers of the empire, for the guardian of the peace of the world." The procession cheered loudly at Prince Bismarck's palace, and paid a similar compliment to Gen. von Moltke. While the procession was passing the palace the multitude bared their heads, and the cheers became wilder and wilder until the Emperor, overcome with emotion, was compelled to withdraw. The procession passed through the town to an open space, where the torches were thrown into heaps, and the students sang patriotic songs. In the rear of the procession was a long row of carriages containing deputations from German and foreign universities. Most of the schools celebrated the event a day in advance. Children in most of them received portraits and short biographies of the Emperor in memory of the occasion. On the morning of the 22d the Emperor received the congratulations of his household, and at eleven o'clock appeared at the window dressed in parade uniform, standing firm and erect, and repeatedly waved vigorous salutes to the crowd. He came to the window often during the day. The greatest outburst of enthusiasm occurred when, after the arrival of Prince Bismarck and Gen. von Moltke, all three appeared, the Emperor in the centre, with Bismarck on his right and Von Moltke on his left. The royal visitors offered their congratulations during the day, and in the afternoon the Emperor and Empress dined at the palace of the Crown Prince. In the evening they attended a soirée in the castle. During the interval between the parts of the entertainment the Emperor walked about and exchanged greetings with his guests, shaking hands with the ambassadors and their wives, saying a few words to a number of the diplomats. After the performance the company adjourned to the four supper rooms, the members of royalty occupying one, the diplomats another, and the suites of foreign princes the two remaining. The Emperor retired to rest before midnight. At all the European capitals the German Ministers held receptions.

Prince Bismarck has assured the Crown Prince Rudolph of Austria-Hungary, who represented his father at the Emperor's birthday celebration, that Germany's foreign policy is pacific, that peace is assured for 1887, and that there is no cause for disquietude in either the East or West. The comment of the Berlin National Gazette is: "The signs of peace that are coming from all sides testify that the occasion is treated in the most splendid and unequivocal manner as a European peace festival. The imposing assembly of princes which has gathered around the Emperor represents the common desire of Europe to maintain the existing state of things. The alliance between Austria, Italy, and Germany, finally concluded only within the last few days, constitutes one of the firmest supports of the tranquillity and security of Europe."

The German Reichstag on March 21 passed the second reading of the Army Budget Bill, agreeing by a large majority to vote the grant which was several times rejected by the former Reichstag for the construction of military schools for non-commissioned officers.

Experiments with an explosive invented by Lieut. Graydon, late of the United States Navy, have been made at the Fortress of Spandau, near Berlin, under the supervision of German officers—it is reported, with success.

The new alliance between Germany, Austria, and Italy places each of these Powers on an equality. All three will undertake the protection of the interests of each of them. Annoyance has been expressed in Paris that the treaty was signed while the attention of France was fixed upon Germany. A former foreign minister of France is reported to have said: "I would have shrunk from nothing to prevent the signing of this treaty, which I consider the most serious and vexatious event for us that has happened in the past sixteen years." But the treaty is regarded as a guarantee of the peace of Europe for some time to come, unless Russia makes the breach.

More arrests have been made of persons suspected of complicity in the recent plot to kill the Czar. An institute at St. Petersburg for the higher education of women has been closed, and the Rector of the University threatens to stop his lectures. It is reported that the Czar has received a letter from the Executive Nihilist Committee, informing him that at a sitting of the Committee on February 22 he was condemned to death. In an "official declaration," made at St. Petersburg, it is said: "The Czar's advisers are convinced that the influential classes in Russia do not consider that the time has yet arrived for the introduction of a constitutional government. Nor do the Panslavist party desire constitutionalism. State socialism, recently promoted in Germany by Prince Bismarck, is being carefully studied by the Russian Government, the Czar being well disposed in favor of such progressive economic changes in the territories under Russian sway as shall conduce to the happiness and welfare of the Russian people."

The rumor is reported from Kabul that the Amir is inciting a holy war against Russia, and denouncing the Czar as a tyrant and promise-breaker.

On his return from Berlin to Paris M. de Lesseps maintained the truth of his assertion that Germany and France were natural friends having common interests. He repeated Bismarck's assurance of this in these words: "May we some day exclaim that we should be stupid to kill each other; let us join forces and be masters of the world. We should then be able to work for the progress of civilization."

Sir G. O. Trevelyan, Unionist, in a speech at Liskeard on March 16, expressed the conviction that the leaders who had been separated from the Liberal party by their objections to the Gladstone bills would never return to that party unless their objections were definitely met, but that it was possible to reconcile the differences, and to deal with the Irish question in a manner more thorough than the half-hearted style of the Conservatives.

On the 17th Mr. Gladstone spoke at a dinner given by Yorkshire members of the House of Commons, and said that there was a growing opinion in favor of home rule even among s former opponents. He counselled Lord Salisbury to waken from his sleep if he wished to banish his "nightmare of English politics." He repeated that it was impossible to deal with other questions until the Irish question had been cleared out of the way. The most significant parts of the speech were these: "We are agreed that Ireland asks effective self-government in affairs properly and exclusively Irish, subject to the unquestionable supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. Should she extend her demands beyond this limit, I frankly tell you I could no longer promote her cause; but so long as the demands she utters are just and within the bounds of moderation, I will stand fast to her cause during what remains to me of political life." "I accept Sir George Trevelyan's desire for reunion as proof of the loyalty of his heart towards us, but I so far differ with him that if the Tories are able to settle the question satisfactorily, I wish them with all my heart to do so. The present schism in our party is useful, showing that we, as a political body, are placing national and material questions above party considerations. While there is so much talk about offers and proposals of conferences, let us not conceal from ourselves the fact that this is strictly not a question of individuals, but one of nations, and when nations collide individuals are liable to be uncomfortably squeezed." "I at once tell you this, and make the confession that in our proposal in behalf of the Irish landlords we went to the furthest point in their behalf. I cherish the hope that it will be perfectly possible to devise a plan for the safe purchase of estates in Ireland, whereby the landlord will receive perfect security with respect to the price of his property, without trenching on the imperial credit." "What I earnestly desire is a gradual approximation of not only the Liberal ranks, but of the nation at large."

Before the Parliamentary Committee appointed to investigate the charges against the London Corporation on March 18, Mr. Firth, formerly a member of Parliament, deposed that a special committee had been appointed in 1882 to oppose the Reform Bill, and that £50,000 was expended by the Committee. He said that practically the city accounts had never been audited. Meetings held in support of the Reform Bill were raided by ruffians who had been supplied with thousands of forged tickets of admission by Corporation officials. A man named Hodge made an affidavit that he had been engaged to bribe ruffians to break up reform meetings.

The closure rule was adopted by the House of Commons on March 18, only forty-one voting against it.

The House of Commons was in session all night March 21-22, and did not adjourn till 1:25 o'clock the next afternoon. The Government insisted on disposing of the Naval and Civil Service Bills, but the Home-Rule members, by obstructive tactics, prevented action on either measure as long as possible, because Mr. Balfour, Secretary for Ireland, had given notice of the introduction of a coercive measure. When the House met on the evening of March 22, Mr. William Henry Smith, the Government leader, moved that the bill for the amendment of the criminal law in Ireland have precedence over all orders of the day. This precipitated a long and spirited debate. Mr. Morley denied absolutely Mr. Smith's assertions as to the lawless condition of Ireland, and demanded that the Government give comparative statistics of crime in Ireland, which, he said, would show that beyond a certain very narrow area the country had seldom been quieter. The Government's proposed restrictive legislation would only aggravate such evils as existed, and would weaken and spoil whatever remedies they had in store. His deliberate conviction was that there had never been a more wanton, gratuitous, and unjustifiable resort to the ever-failing, ever-poisonous remedy of coercion. Mr. Smith and Mr. Balfour replied at length. Although neither of them made any explicit statement of the Government's Irish measures, an analysis of their speeches shows that a definite policy has been decided upon and fully elaborated. The programme begins with the Coercion Bill conjoined with a tenants' relief bill, to be introduced in the House of Lords. The relief proposals will consist of giving tenants power to stay evictions by declaring their inability to pay full rent and wiping out the claim by surrender to the Bankruptcy Court. A measure for land purchase, based upon Mr. Chamberlain's land-bank scheme, will follow. If the Government should be defeated at any point in the development of their policy they will not resign, but will appeal to the country.

A feature of the observance of St. Patrick's Day in England was the appearance of many Englishmen wearing shamrocks.

Father Keller, a Catholic priest, was arrested on March 18 at Youghal, Ireland, for refusing to give information concerning the plan of campaign, which, he declared, he had received in confidence from members of his flock. He was carried to Dublin, and on the way crowds cheered him as the "martyr priest." At Dublin, on the 19th, he was driven to court in the Lord Mayor's carriage. Father Keller, being sworn, refused to testify as to his custody of tenants' money as trustee under the "plan of campaign." He was then committed for contempt and was ordered to enter a cab in the custody of officers. The people made a rush for the vehicle, removed the horses, and dragged it through the streets to Kilmainham Jail, where the priest was locked up. Archbishop Walsh, Mr. William O'Brien, Lord Mayor Sullivan, and Mr. Timothy Harrington, M. P., followed the priest to the jail in carriages. The people marched after them singing "God Save Ireland" and "We'll hang Judge Boyd on a sour orange tree," and they uncovered their heads on arriving there. Mr. O'Brien predicted in an address to the crowd that the conflict which had been begun would end in the destruction of Tory power and "the present infamous system of alien misrule." Father Keller remarked that his journey had been more like that of a conqueror than of an humble pastor. Archbishop Croke, in an address presented to Father Keller, said: "No Government has ever grappled successfully with Irish priesthood. The present Government will rue the day it threw down a fresh gage of battle." Mr. John Dillon, in the House of Commons, protested against the arrest, and Mr. Parnell declared that Mr. Balfour would not escape "retribution and the judgment of history as one who had entered upon a task of bloodshed with a light heart, or as one who, during a short period in office, had shown more callousness and indifference than any previous Secretary."

Bishop Keane of Richmond, Va., preached a sermon on Sunday in the Irish Franciscan Church of St. Isidore, at Rome, on the subject of St. Patrick and the Irish nation, in which he emphatically expressed a desire for greater Irish liberty.

The April number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain Tennyson's Jubilee Ode to Queen Victoria.

At a meeting of citizens of Halifax on March 17, it was decided to offer a silver cup valued at $500 for a yacht-race prize on June 21, in connection with the Queen's jubilee celebration. Halifax is the only imperial military station in British North America, and on that date there will be a naval and military review there.

A public consistory was held at Rome on March 19, when the eight new Cardinals, Archbishop Gonzales of Toledo, Mgr. Aloisi-Masella, ex-Nuncio at Lisbon, Archbishop Taschereau of Quebec, Archbishop Gibbons of Baltimore, Archbishop Bernadou of Sens, Archbishop Place of Rennes, Archbishop Langénieux of Reims, and Archbishop Giordani of Ferrara, were hatted by the Pope with the imposing ceremony of the Church.

DEMOCRATIC PREPARATIONS.

It is said to be the confident belief of a considerable number of shrewd men in the Democratic party that "Cleveland cannot be renominated," and all the subsoiling and pipelaying which is now going on in this State in preparation for the Convention next year is said to be conducted on this assumption. Of course, the reasons for this opinion are various, but the most powerful one is his unsatisfactory behavior both with regard to appointments and dismissals from office. He has kept too many Republicans in their places, and he has in filling vacancies paid too little attention to recommendations. In other words, he has taken the reform talk of his party in its platforms and on the stump too seriously, and he has not taken Congressmen into his confidence as much as party custom is thought to require. Whenever the tale of these woes is told to a listener on whom they do not seem to make sufficient impression, they are apt to be fortified by a whisper that "Cleveland does not really want a renomination, and would not take it if it were offered him to-morrow"; that he is tired of official life, and longs for retirement, with the accompaniment of domestic happiness, which is now for the first time within his reach. The authority for this statement is never given, but it is usually garnished with enough nods and winks to make it appear that it comes direct from either the President and Mrs. Cleveland, or Col. Lamont, his private secretary, and therefore there is no use in attacking it on the score of improbability.

Now, we do not propose to dispute with the various adroit gentlemen who are engaged in overhauling and oiling the nominating machinery in this State, either as to the merits of Mr. Cleveland's Administration or as to the chances of his renomination. They know as well as we do, and better than we, the uncertainties which attend the action of conventions, the frequency with which the politicians of one State find their most careful arrangements completely upset by countercurrents of sentiment from other States when the Convention meets. Delusion on this point is likely to be unusually great in New York this year, owing both to the fact that President Cleveland is a New York product, and to the fact that this is the only State in which the politicians have gone to work to manufacture a rival and successor for him. Those who go to the Convention to rail and intrigue against him from his own State will think themselves greatly strengthened, therefore, by being able to offer a substitute. What we have to suggest is, that they should take into account now the absolute ignorance of that portion of the community which lies outside the circle of managing politicians, about the things which most damage Mr. Cleveland in their eyes. The reasons why he cannot be renominated are, we venture to assert, not known to-day to over one thousand of the eleven or twelve millions who will cast ballots at the election of 1888.

This, it must be admitted, is for Mr. Cleveland's enemies a state of things which cannot be remedied too soon. It will not do to let the Southern and Western delegates get together under the impression which, we venture to assert, now prevails among their constituents, that Mr. Cleveland has done so well that not only is there no reason why he should not be renominated, but that his renomination is an absolute necessity to the party if it wishes to retain control of the Government. This, of course, may be a very false impression. It may be that the managers in New York could destroy it if they chose. It is certain, however, that it cannot be destroyed suddenly. It will take time to do it. It is no easy matter, as every one knows who has had to do with the shaping of public opinion on any subject, to rid the popular mind of an opinion once formed. Anybody who undertakes the work cannot begin too early, or repeat himself too much. Any one, therefore, who means to have the Convention throw Mr. Cleveland overboard when it meets, unless he can count on a letter from Mr. Cleveland positively declining the nomination before the Convention meets, should go to work at once to prepare reasons against his nomination which will bear publicity.

All those reasons of which we have heard anything, or which are in circulation in the inner councils of party management, are in a certain sense secret and confidential. They are the kind of objection that men communicate to their friends after dinner, or over brandy and soda in clubs and cafés, which they have generally heard from somebody else, and which it would be base to give to a newspaper reporter. But something less delicate than this will be needed to affect the Convention. Arguments must be prepared which will bear publication of the widest kind on the stump and in the press; arguments which can not only be whispered but shouted, and which plain people who do not occupy themselves much with party machinery, can understand and appreciate. We do not say there are no such arguments. We simply say that they have not yet seen the light, and that it is time that they did. The delusion that Mr. Cleveland —if delusion it be—has made a good President is widespread and deep-seated. It would be little short of madness for his opponents in this State to allow delegates from other States to be elected under its influence, and to remain steeped in it between now and next year. We trust, therefore, we shall soon see the objections to him set out in black and white.

THE READJUSTER INCIDENT.

The retirement of Mahone from the United States Senate marks the end of a curious incident in American politics. It is true that his colleague, Riddleberger, has two years still to serve, but Riddleberger is an utter nonentity, except when he makes himself a nuisance, and has no political weight whatever. When Mahone's term expired, the Mahone party virtually collapsed.

William Mahone was a "Confederate Brigadier" from Virginia during the civil war, and a leading Democrat in the years succeeding the war. He was openly charged by the Republicans with responsibility for some of the grossest frauds by which the negro voters were cheated out of their rights, and he remained in close affiliation with the Democratic Machine until it refused to gratify his ambition for the Governorship. Finding that it was impossible for him to control his own party, he went to work to organize another party which he could boss. The debt question gave him just the opportunity which he needed. A considerable proportion of the white voters were ready to welcome a movement for partial repudiation. The ignorant mass of black voters could, of course, be easily solidified in support of such a movement. The only thing requisite was an unscrupulous man, familiar with the worst methods of Machine politics, and Mahone exactly filled the bill. The man and the opportunity met. In 1879 a Legislature was chosen which elected Mahone to the United States Senate as a Repudiator, under the more euphonious title of Readjuster.

Thus far the matter had been purely a State affair, with which the Republican party of the nation had nothing to do. But when, upon the opening of the special session of the Senate, after Garfield's inauguration in March, 1881, Mahone went up to Washington to take his seat, the Republican party of the nation was called upon to define its position towards him. There was but one thing for it to do. It had always opposed repudiation and prided itself upon its honorable financial record. Mahone's policy in Virginia had been opposed by the white Republicans of character and honor, and a fifth of the Republicans in the Legislature had voted against his election to the Senate. He was a boss of the most odious type, whose personal record was so bad as to forfeit the sympathy of good men. Every consideration of party and public policy forbade his receiving any support from the Republicans in the Senate.

But parties were so evenly divided just then that Mahone held the "balance of power" in the Senate. He was ready to support the Republicans if they would violate all their professions of fidelity to civil-service reform, turn out the efficient Democratic officials of the Senate, and give the place of Sergeant-at Arms to his man Riddleberger. He held out also the hope that, if properly supported by "patronage," he could make a break in the "solid South," and turn over the electoral vote of Virginia to the Republican candidate for President in 1884. The Republicans yielded to the temptation, and Mr George Frisbie Hoar, in a burst of bathos, thus welcomed this soldier of fortune, this boss, this repudiator:

> "There are Democrats in the South who do not mean to live any longer in the graveyards and among the tombs, whose face is toward the morning, and on whose brow the rising sunlight of the future generations of this country is already beginning to be visible. Of such Democrats the avant-courrier has already reached the Senate chamber after long waiting and yearning. The Republicans of the North desire to stretch forth a friendly hand."

The White House was as friendly as the Senate Chamber, and a Republican President turned over to Mahone all the patronage of Virginia. Six years have passed, and what is the result of this "avant-courrier's" work? The public sentiment of Virginia regarding the State debt has been utterly demoralized. The Republican party of the State has degenerated into a merely personal organization, controlled for the private ends of the ruling boss. The standard of politics in the Old Dominion has been so lowered under his rule that the worst faults of the old Bourbons appear venial in comparison with his sway, and his downfall was welcomed scarcely less warmly by honest Republicans throughout the country than by honest Democrats in Virginia. The split in the solid South has not come, and the prejudice of the better class of whites against a Republican party which is represented by a repudiator is stronger than it was six years ago. Mahone himself can no longer give the Republicans in the Senate the assistance of his tainted vote, and the colleague whom he has left there, fit pupil of such a master, is a man so unscrupulous and untrustworthy that nobody feels any assurance that he will not go over to the Democrats for the remaining two years of his term.

It should not have required such an experience to convince anybody that a "party of moral ideas" could not touch the pitch of repudiation and escape being defiled; but nothing short of such a lesson could have taught anything to men who were in the state of frenzy which Mr. Hoar exhibited when he delivered his apostrophe to Mahone. Fortunately the lesson has been so effective that it may be hoped its effect will be lasting, and that we shall not soon see a great national party throwing away all its principles, in the hope that corruption will win more than honesty.

EMIGRATION FROM GERMANY.

The influence of economic forces in determining the strength and direction of the emigration of man is beyond question, and the course of immigration into the United States from all parts of the world during the last twenty-five years is evidence of this influence. Natural causes, however, have been of greater importance during that period than artificial, and interest has centred more in this country and its conditions than in the countries where the migration originated. The introduction of a series of artificial influences offers a new feature which may command some notice, and nowhere has this feature been more prominent than in Germany.

Since 1878 the German Government has exercised a continually increasing control over the economy of its people, which has now reached an extent and thoroughness that, when considered with the rapidity with which the measures were conceived and carried into execution, surpass the efforts of any other European nation in that direction during the last fifty years. In 1878 a system of factory inspection was framed, still imperfect in its performance, but very useful in protecting the lives, health, and general interests of factory operatives; in 1879 the policy of protection to home industries was raised to a principle by the framing of a tariff designed to exclude foreign competition; then followed the legal institution of sick and invalid funds by employers and their men, and finally in October last the Accident Insurance Law, applying to workers on farms as well as to workers in factories, went into operation. The general intention of these measures was to improve the condition of the workingman, and to enlarge his opportunities for employment; and while it is difficult to say whether there has been a positive advance in wages or in the general welfare of the German workingman, the hope, at least, of a benefit has been held out to him, his rigid dependence upon his daily labor for his daily bread has been somewhat loosened, and age, sickness, or disability has no longer the same terrors for him. To these State measures should be added the efforts of individual firms, also tending to make the position of the laborer more endurable.

The general thrift of the German workingman would enable him to make the most of whatever improvement these reforms might involve; and a few pennies saved, as the reports of the inspectors of factories show, would widen materially the margin between sufficiency and want. Of the enlarged opportunity for employment there can be little doubt, for the development of mining and manufacturing industries has been very great. In 1883 207,577 men were employed in mining black coal, as compared with 170,509 in 1879. The copper mines gave employment to 14,326 miners in 1883, and 9,118 in 1879. The number of furnaces and foundries increased during the same period from 227 to 270, and the hands employed from 32,242 to 42,724. While this increase of employment has been especially marked in the metal and sugar industries, it has also occurred in other branches of manufacture. This great increase in the demand for labor in manufactures—though not commensurate with the rapid growth of the German population—and the consciousness that the Government is exercising a watchful care over their concerns, have doubtless deterred many from emigrating to the United States who would otherwise have gone.

Have these influences yet affected the emigration of skilled labor from Germany to the United States? The tide of German emigration has of late years been fed chiefly from the sparsely settled agricultural districts, like Mecklenburg and Pomerania, and not from the industrial districts, like Saxony and the Rhineland. The succession of bad harvests that followed 1873, resulting in the extensive absorption of small farms into large holdings, may explain the movement. It is not the farming element, however, that now interests us, but the skilled labor, and in this case skilled labor refers to domestic or hand skill, and not to mechanical skill. As the German Government keeps no records of the occupations of emigrants, the Treasury reports must supply the information.

Since 1873 the percentage of skilled labor of the total immigration from Germany has been:

1873.....	10.03 per cent.	1880.....	12.86 per cent.
1874.....	11.18 "	1881.....	11.41 "
1875.....	13.82 "	1882.....	10.58 "
1876.....	13.62 "	1883.....	12.93 "
1877.....	14.54 "	1884.....	12.31 "
1878.....	14.25 "	1885.....	10.44 "
1879.....	13.48 "	1886.....	11.01 "

The year 1873 was in great part a time of great inflation in this country, and during it the effects of the war between France and Prussia, also, may have swelled unduly the total emigration. 1879 marked the last of six years of almost universal stagnation and depression; while 1886 was a year of moderate depression. As skilled labor receives higher wages and is in better demand than common labor, it is less likely to be so severely influenced in its power to emigrate by years of depression than is the latter; and, in fact, it does form a larger proportion of the emigration in a bad than in a good year, when it is overwhelmed by great movements in the lower and unskilled classes of population, who seize upon any temporary advantage to migrate. So that while the percentage in 1886 is, according to the table, about the same as it was in 1874, it really marks a decided falling off, as it should be nearer the percentage of 1877 or 1878.

There is another method of reaching the same conclusion. In 1873 48,792 skilled immigrants landed in the United States; in 1879 the number had fallen to 21,362, and in 1886 had again risen to 36,522. These figures represent 10.6, 12, and 11 per cent. of the total immigration in the respective years. Of the skilled immigrants Germany supplied 30.77 per cent. in 1873, 21.37 per cent. in 1879, and 25.45 per cent. in 1886, and did not therefore follow the general variations, but one peculiar to itself, giving a high average in 1873, a low one in 1879, and a medium in 1886, as compared with a low general average in 1873, and higher averages in 1879 and 1886. The conclusion is that the domestic policy of Germany has influenced unfavorably the movement of skilled labor to this country.

This influence can hardly be permanent, because it depends upon the continued success of artificial relations, relations, it may be added, that are working their own failure. The productive energies of the empire cannot be indefinitely expanded at a rapid rate, for the markets for the products are more and more difficult to obtain, and cannot be held by bounties and subsidies save at great cost. There are already indications of a partial break down, more especially in the sugar and iron industries, where over-stimulation has resulted in overproduction, and, as a further consequence, in bankrupt works, lower wages, and masses of labor without employment and willing to work for a pittance. The same extreme condition may not result in the less favored industries, but the immunity of Germany from the economic ills that have beset other nations since 1879 is being broken down, and labor must suffer. It is not a rash prediction to assert that unless a period of prosperity intervenes, the migration of skilled labor, and this time of labor familiar with the use of machinery, from Germany to the United States may be greater than ever in a few years. Assisted emigration to German colonies may for the time deflect the current from this country, but the advantages to be gained here are too great to be overthrown by any system of moderate State aid. The question is not without interest to the economist.

WHY HAS INTEREST IN POLITICS DECLINED IN ENGLAND?

London, March 4, 1887.

The causes of a singular and perhaps permanent alteration in national character are in the main twofold:

(1.) The gradual transformation of an aristocratic into a democratic Constitution.

An aristocratic government means of necessity the administration of public affairs by persons intensely interested in the work (or the game) of politics. A king may hold power simply because he is the descendant of kings. Louis XV. ruled France because he was the descendant of Louis XIV. Charles II. would never have influenced the destinies of England had he not represented a long line of monarchs. A democracy may, for a time, maintain itself by the simple weight of numbers. American citizens may or may not be vigilant to protect their own rights, but the huge force of the collective People is enough to crush even the thought of an anti-democratic revolution. Whether the apparent immensity of the force at the disposal of a democracy will, in the long run, be sufficient to protect popular governments from attack, is an open question. All that my argument requires is the fact that, where the mass of the citizens constitute the ruling power in a state, the mere weight of numbers may, without any great energy on the part of individuals, keep the Constitution in force. Where a limited number of noble families bear sway, there must be a constant struggle for the maintenance of power. With the English aristocracy this certainly has been so. One portion of English history is, in effect, the struggle of the nobles to keep alive rights menaced by the Crown. Another portion is, in effect, a contest to maintain rights or privileges against the increasing power of the people.

Nor is this attitude of conflict the sole circumstance which, under an aristocratic régime, invests politics with a special interest. Government carried on by the members of wealthy and high-born families is not "personal government" in the sense in which that term is now generally employed, but it is a government by prominent persons. It is a form of rule in which personal considerations, personal interests, the virtues no less than the vices of definite individuals, exercise immense weight on the policy of the commonwealth. The private vices of Fox and of Sheridan, the personal defects of George III., the disinterestedness of Chatham, the inscrutability of Lord Shelburne, all went a great way to determine the fortunes of England. No doubt another kind of personal influence has, as we all know, immense weight in a democratic society. But this influence flows from power over the multitude possessed by some one leader. It does not in the main depend upon what we may call the family peculiarities, which often tell decisively on the policy that prevails under an aristocratic constitution. The expressions, "the great families," "the Revolution families," "the Newcastle interest," and the like, which abound in memoirs of the last century, suggest a good deal to any one who reflects on the latent meaning of current phrases. They signify, among other things, that o the leading politicians of a former age public affairs were, in fact, family affairs. Contests for power had, if you like, the narrowness, the bitterness, and the selfishness, but they possessed also the absorbing interest, of quarrels among relations. The world will have undergone a revolution unlike any change of which history has preserved the record, when men cease to grow enthusiastic, or zealous, or hot, or passionate about the virtues or defects, the wisdom or the cunning, of themselves or their relatives. Limit the field of public life to a comparatively small body of persons, and you insure that political controversy shall be at least as interesting as gossip. If anything be still wanting to the excitement of party contests, make the pecuniary prosperity of public men depend upon the success of their party; you will then be sure to see the fire of political fervor blaze up again with renewed brightness. When, as in the last century, public life might be the road to fortune, bad men and good men alike were as keen about public affairs as men are now about success at the bar or in business.

It was, moreover, under these circumstances, possible to believe in all cases, what was true in some instances, that a man's political opponents were actuated by the basest of base motives. Modern rhetoric languishes for want of the patent gross vices which rhetoric should be employed to scourge. The last real triumph of rhetorical invective is to be found in the effect produced by Disraeli's attacks on Peel. Yet one cannot doubt that Lord Beaconsfield, as a critic, would have admitted that his denunciations were deficient in something which gives their real force to the sarcasms of Junius. This "something" was the possibility of imputing pecuniary corruption to the Minister made the object of attack. The readers of Junius could believe without difficulty—though in many cases the belief was grossly unjust—that the interest of the nation was sacrificed to the cupidity of Ministers. Not the bitterest protectionist in the House of Commons could have been brought to believe that Peel repealed the Corn Laws to fill his own pockets. Private vices may or may not be public benefits, but they assuredly add at times a good deal to the interest of political life. It would, however, be no less unfair than absurd to suppose that in the main the interest felt in politics fifty years or a century ago was due to the vices of aristocratic government. It was caused quite as much by the one great merit of an aristocratic constitution. Institutions which lead the baser kind of men to look upon public affairs as matters mainly of private interest, lead nobler spirits to identify their own interests with the prosperity of the commonwealth. George the Third's Duke of Newcastle was not an impressive representative of the English aristocracy, but, when he left office, he displayed one element of dignity which should never be forgotten. He had greatly reduced his private fortune in the service of the state, and he declined all compensation. With the more heroic leaders of the same age, the same trait appears under nobler forms. They were reckless, unscrupulous, even greedy of gain for themselves, and still more for their followers. But they knew how to spend lavishly money, strength, and talent in what seemed to them the service of the state, even when it took the form of devotion to a party.

English party spirit was both intensified and occasionally exalted into patriotism by the existence of two conditions in the state of the world which appear—for the moment, at least—to have no existence. The first was the striking contrast between the freedom and grandeur of the great English free state, and the despotism and meanness prevailing among the states of the Continent. The second was the peril of invasion. We are all apt to forget that, until Napoleon's schemes of attacking England were finally baffled, there was always before the English mind a sense of possible armed attack from France. Whoever will study in the 'Annual Register' the account of the court-martial held on Admiral Keppel, will see that a century ago the French fleet might appear to Englishmen as fearful a menace as does the German army of to-day to Frenchmen. Whoever reads 'Peter Plymley's Letters' will see that an observer as calm as Sydney Smith could fear to see French soldiers encamped round London, as truly as French journalists may dread to see German armies at Versailles. When a feeble foreign policy may result in encouraging the invasion of England, the question whether Tories or Whigs were in power had for Englishmen an immediate personal importance hardly realized by men who feel as if the worst blunder we could make must lead to no worse calamity than the sacrifice of prestige in Afghanistan.

Add to all this that the interests of the members of an aristocracy are generally as narrow as they are intense. Englishmen wonder, when they read about their forefathers, to learn that eminent statesmen left the House of Commons for the gambling table or for the prize fight. But if you turn the matter the other way, it comes to this—that the statesmen of a past generation had no elevating occupation but the pursuit of politics. England, it may be said, has not for centuries been governed wholly by an aristocracy. This is true; but the point to note is, that while the Constitution was aristocratic, the tone of the country was the tone of the nobility. A political class governed the nation, and imbued the whole nation with political passion. Under a modern democracy it is necessarily otherwise. Power lies with the masses, but the interest of the crowd cannot be mainly political. The majority of mankind are of necessity occupied, in one form or another, with earning their livelihood. This is true of the professional no less than of the working classes; but, of course, the lower down you go in the grade of wealth, the more absorbing becomes the struggle for existence. It is vain to suppose that English laborers can occupy their time in thoughts about politics: their heart must be in their daily work. A proposal to abolish outdoor relief, or to relax the rules which compel paupers to go into a workhouse, would, we may be quite certain, kindle more feeling of one kind or another among the country laborers of England than would a proposal to give up our Indian Empire or to allow the establishment of an Irish republic. That this is so, is no matter for indignation. The inevitable should never excite anger. High policies and grand schemes of statecraft are at bottom but devices for securing to large bodies of men the happiness of civilized existence. This, however, may be confidently asserted, that when power lies with the majority of the people, schemes directly affecting popular comfort or happiness will excite more general emotion than plans dignified with the name of high policy. Here we come across a second cause for the changed attitude of Englishmen towards politics.

(2.) The increased interest felt in religious and social questions.

In one form or another, every thinker who influenced public life in England during the last century (or, indeed, till late into the earlier part of this century) shared one belief, namely, the importance for good or bad of constitutional, and what we may call purely political, arrangements. To this general statement Burke, it will be said, was an exception. But the exception is only apparent. He perceived, indeed, the side of truth popularly embodied in the maxim that "constitutions grow but are not made." But his consistent opposition to even small changes in the form of the Constitution certainly shows that he had not grasped the conclusion which many modern politicians practically draw from the maxim I have cited, that alterations in the form of a constitution, if they cannot effect any great good, need not be resisted, because they can produce no great harm. Now as long as this belief in the importance of alterations in the Constitution of England held its ground, the result followed that politics remained a matter of interest, since the success of a party might involve alterations in the form of the Constitution. The men who advocated or opposed the abolition of rotten boroughs did so because they believed that to deprive Old Sarum of her member was to smooth the path of rapid progress, or else was to open the door to fundamental and violent revolution. The statesmen who, a year or two back, could not even get up a decent party battle over the question of extending household suffrage to the counties, must have felt, though very possibly without reason, that changes in the Parliamentary franchise were at bottom matters of trivial importance. This state of feeling no doubt flows in great part from the success with which, in England, constitutional changes have been carried through without producing any palpable disturbance in the social condition of the country. But it is partly to be attributed to other causes. Methodism, it has been well remarked, turned the working classes of England away from revolutionary towards religious aspirations, and it seems almost past a doubt that the "interest"—remember I do not say "passion," which is quite a different matter—aroused among the English public by theological or religious discussion, has tended to lower the excitement of political controversy. Let any one read carefully through the pages of the London Spectator. He will find therein a great deal about politics, but, if my supposed reader will weigh the matter carefully, he will, I think, come to the conclusion that the readers of that periodical are a good deal more interested in theological than in political questions. Some years ago some letter or article in the Spectator gave rise to correspondence about the efficacy of prayer. What thousands of communications the editors must have received I can only conjecture, but to the most casual observer the fact soon became apparent that the discretion of the editors, and not the weariness of the public, put an end to a discussion which, after being continued for weeks, still apparently possessed an unlimited attraction for the large body of intelligent readers.

Theology, however, has, it is supposed (whether truly or not I cannot say), little interest for the masses. What undoubtedly has an interest for them is any topic which can be brought within the limits of what is vaguely called Socialism. No two books can be conceived which at a first blush differ more from each other than the 'Life and Work of the Seventh Earl of Shaftesbury' and Besant's 'Children of Gibeon.' But though the one work is long, stiff, solid, and, if the truth be said, a trifle dull, and the other amusing, bright, and, to speak with equal veracity, not a little shallow, they both breathe one spirit. They both are filled with the conviction that the state of the poor and the improvement of that state by social efforts are the topics, and I might almost say the only topics, worth the consideration of humane and rational men. Whatever may be the case with the poor themselves, one thing is apparent with regard to the wealthier classes: the most enthusiastic, if not always the wisest, men among them are turning their minds towards social rather than to political problems. Nor, if social questions are really the chief concern of the age, is it out of harmony with the habitual course of English history that well-to-do Englishmen should become the leaders of the mass of the people in what, under their guidance, may ultimately turn out a pacific and beneficial revolution. Meanwhile, one may be quite sure that, the capacity of the human mind and heart being limited, interest given to the improvement of houses in the East End is in general so much interest diverted from questions affecting the preservation of the Constitution or the integrity of the Empire. Socialism in all its forms is at bottom the foe to patriotism. A generation supremely interested in social reform is likely also to be a generation more or less indifferent to political conflicts, except in so far as they immediately affect the material welfare of the people.

AN OBSERVER.

SCHERER'S GRIMM.

PARIS, March 7, 1887.

If there is a writer upon whom the mantle of Sainte-Beuve may be said to have fallen, it is M. Edmond Scherer. Unfortunately politics has for many years absorbed much of his time, and, as his moderate views are not triumphant, his political work may be said to have been lost. It is not so with his literary work. He has already published eight volumes of studies on contemporary literature, one volume of 'Mélanges d'histoire religieuse,' one volume on Diderot; and he gives us now a volume on 'Melchior Grimm, the Man of Letters, the Factotum, the Diplomat.'

Grimm has acquired universal renown by his 'Literary Correspondence,' though very few people have taken the trouble in our time to read it. In his own time he was somewhat obscure. His name first became familiar after the publication of the second part of Rousseau's 'Confessions' (which came out in 1788), and more so after the publication of the memoirs of Mme. d'Épinay, eleven years after his death. The famous 'Correspondence' was private, and was only published in 1812. In 1853 Sainte-Beuve wrote two articles on him; before that date Danzel had been occupied with Grimm in his book 'Gottsched and his Time,' which appeared in 1848. The Russian Historical Society published in 1878 the correspondence between Grimm and Catharine of Russia, and afterwards completed its work by the publication of letters which have recently been found in Poland. Grimm's 'Literary Correspondence' has had several editions, the best being the last, and the work of M. Tourneux. We have now probably all the documents which concern Grimm, and we can easily conceive that M. Scherer should have been tempted to write his biography.

Frederic Melchior Grimm was born at Ratisbon on September 26, 1723; his family was poor, his father one of the Lutheran ministers of the town. He was well educated, and made at Leipzig the acquaintance of Gottsched. He wrote a tragedy while he was at the University—a very flat tragedy. He lived for a short time in the family of the Schombergs as a tutor, and in 1748 went to France with a young member of that family. He became reader to the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, who was then in Paris, and Rousseau even says that for a while he remained "chez des filles du quartier Saint-Roch." The Comte de Friese took him as a secretary. They were both young; the Count was rich and fond of pleasure. He gave weekly dinners to Diderot, Rousseau, Helvétius, Marmontel. Grimm had not been two years in Paris before he became acquainted with a number of people. His young and profligate patron was trying to imitate the heroes of Richardson and Laclos. Grimm himself was more sentimental. Rousseau laughs at his great passion for Mlle. Fel, a celebrated singer at the Opéra. The Abbé Raynal was one of Grimm's confidants. Mlle. Fel did not take pity on the poor German; she treated him with marked contempt, and his vanity cured him of his love.

Grimm rapidly renounced his mother tongue, and began to write in French. He wrote articles on theatrical representations, made his début in the Mercure; and when he wrote 'Le Petit Prophète,' which was the event of a day, Voltaire said, "What means this little Bohemian who dares to have more wit than ourselves?" The 'Petit Prophète' related to the arrival of the Italian Bouffe in Paris, and to the great quarrel between the Italian and the French schools of music. It has lost much of its interest, but it gave to Grimm his letters of naturalization. The success of the 'Petit Prophète' was immense. Grimm, who made himself the patron of the Italian music, became also one of the protectors of Mozart, who arrived in 1763 in Paris with his father. The decisive moment in his life was the beginning of the correspondence which he sent, every fortnight for twenty years, to the various courts of Europe. Others before him had undertaken a similar work; the intellectual supremacy of France, the scarcity of journals, explain such undertakings. The news from Paris was awaited with impatience in Berlin, in St. Petersburg, at the dull little German courts.

Raynal, the author of the History of the Two Indies, chose Grimm as his successor for correspondence which he sent to the court of Germany. "I have made it my rule," said Grimm in 1766, "to send my correspondence only to princes. Important personages in England have offered me large sums for it, but I have never consented to send it to them." The price was not the same for all princes. The King of Poland, for instance, paid only forty ducats a year, or 400 francs; the Empress of Russia paid 360 rubles, or 1,500 francs. Goethe tells us that he shared the letters, by the courtesy of his friends at Weimar, and that he read them with great attention. Grimm not only gave all the literary news of the day, he sometimes gave extracts from remarkable works. The 'Correspondence' is a real mine of documents on the dramatic art of the eighteenth century. Grimm had a passion for the theatre, and his descriptions of Clairon, of Raucourt, of many others, are full of life. He is also the precursor of our modern school of criticism, which is not a dry analysis, but subjects a work to many collateral considerations, and shows it in all its surroundings. He is sometimes pompous, often heavy, too full of general theories on everything—on women, on art, on languages. He has the jargon of his time—love of nature, horror of fanaticism, sensibility, delicious emotions, tears running constantly from his eyes, and so on; but he has also much good sense, a real knowledge of men and things. Moreover, he is superior to the subjects which he treats, and sees everything from a high standpoint. He can be witty, he can be eloquent. Grimm's philosophy was different from the philosophy of the French "philosophes." Scherer goes perhaps a little too far when he sees in him an unconscious Positivist, an unconscious Darwinian, a moral Determinist. Grimm had the German tendency to generalization, but he was not very systematic. He did not much believe in progress; he said that "the finest centuries are precisely the germ of the centuries of decadence." There was in him a curious vein of scepticism; he often quarrelled with Diderot, who believed in human perfectibility. He believed that "Europe was threatened with some sinister revolution" long before 1789 and 1793.

In politics, the preferences of Grimm are for an enlightened despotism, but we must remember that he wrote for sovereigns. His social doctrine is well summed up in these lines:

"Let us not be children, and do not let us be afraid of words. In fact, there is no other right in the world than the right of the strongest; and if everything must be said, it is the only legitimate right. The moral world is composed of forces like the physical world; not to admit that the strongest must be the master, is as reasonable as not to be willing that a stone which weighs a hundred pounds should weigh more than the stone which weighs twenty pounds. It is this science of forces which gives the true elements of natural right and of the law of nations. Whether men were subjugated first by the force of arms, by persuasion, or by paternal authority, it is just the same: the truth is, that they are governed and always will be governed, that a man alone can do nothing against the mass of men and that he must endure its pressure, that the state of society is a forced state, in which action and reaction are continual."

Rousseau had been introduced to Mme. d'Épinay by Francueil; he himself introduced to her his friend Grimm. Mme. d'Épinay found herself at the time in a very critical situation. Her sister, at the point of death, had charged her to burn certain compromising letters.

Among these were supposed to be papers concerning a debt of M. d'Épinay, whose wife would thus have destroyed the proofs of the existence of this debt. The affair made much noise and was discussed everywhere. At a dinner given by the Comte de Friese, Grimm undertook the defence of Mme. d'Épinay, and a duel ensued in a garden of the hôtel. Grimm was slightly wounded, and Mme. d'Épinay could not but feel much gratitude for her "chevalier." Her complete innocence was proved some time afterwards, and the papers, which were supposed to be stolen, were found in the hands of a third party. Grimm became the friend, the adviser, the counsellor of Mme. d'Épinay, and by degrees his influence completely substituted itself for that of the tortuous and cynical Duclos, of the light-headed and light-hearted Francueil, who remembered at times that he had been the first lover of Mme. d'Épinay, and finally of Rousseau

Scherer is very severe on Rousseau. He knows nothing more revolting than the second part of the 'Confessions,' in which Rousseau constantly denounces Mme. d'Épinay and Grimm:

"The most cynical egoism, the most odious ingratitude, the most insinuating malignity are allied to effusions of sensibility and to virtuous pretensions. All is base in this man, who thinks he excuses disgusting vices by confiding them to the public, throwing off the burden of gratitude by calumniating those who have spoiled him by the most touching attentions; whose favorite society is the servant who bears him children which he sends one after another to the Foundling Asylum. In vain do people say that he is mad, that his madness is increasing and characteristic; in vain are his malice, his duplicity, his suspicions considered as pathological symptoms; we feel that the soul of the writer was always vile, and we experience a sort of satisfaction in recognizing that, with all his talent, he never succeeded in disguising his native vulgarity."

Mme. d'Épinay may be said to have spent the second part of her life in repairing the errors of the first, and it cannot be denied that the influence of Grimm was very beneficial to her. Her Memoirs are, in Scherer's opinion, one of the most agreeable books of the eighteenth century, as curious as a document for the moral history of an epoch as they are captivating as a biography. At the death of the Comte de Friese, Grimm was appointed secrétaire des commandements of the Duke of Orleans. This title gave him a salary and no real duties. The judgment which Grimm passed in 1793, in a letter written to the Empress Catharine, on Orleans-Egalité, deserves to be cited, as it shows the better side of the Prince who voted for the death of Louis XVI. and paid for this dreadful error with his own death:

"He was not a genius, he was not an eagle; he had perhaps a rather borné mind. But nature had given him such an instinct for honor and for honest people that no bad character ever could approach, and still less circumvent him or abide near him. . . . Love of pleasure sometimes led him, like others, into bad company, but the dignity of his rank and a certain decency followed him even in his orgies; his companions in pleasure always found the Prince. The court of the Palais-Royal was extremely brilliant. Whatever was most respectable in France aspired to the honor of being admitted to it; it was not 'de bon ton' not to be of it, and if Louis XV. was King at Versailles, the Duke of Orleans was called the King of Paris."

Grimm had entered into communication with many princes, and he aspired to the honor of entering diplomacy. He first became the Minister of the free city of Frankfort, with the salary of 24,000 livres a year, afterwards Minister of the Court of Saxe-Gotha. He accompanied German princes on their journeys in England and in Russia, and he finally became the friend of Catharine of Russia, who treated him with the greatest generosity. Mme. d'Épinay was ruined by her husband's dissipations. Her daughter married M. de Belsunce, and, after her death (which took place in 1783), Grimm took entire charge of Émilie, her granddaughter. He interested the Empress Catharine in her fate, and married her to the Comte de Bueil. One of the last acts of Catharine was the nomination of Grimm as Minister of Russia at Hamburg. He did not remain long in this town, for the loss of an eye obliged him to hand in his resignation. The Emperors Paul and Alexander continued, however, to pay him his salary. He spent the remainder of his life in Gotha, in a house which the Duke placed at his disposal. Goethe saw him at Gotha in 1801. Grimm died December 19, 1807, at the age of eighty-four years. He said of his own life, after the death of Catharine: "Three-fourths of my life have been so happy that if I had died at the proper moment I might have been counted among the most fortunate of men; but the last fourth, so cruelly painful, has ended in a mortal blow, which found me defenceless." Grimm had seen the Revolution triumph; the world which he had known was no more; Napoleon was triumphant. Grimm had lived long enough to witness from his retreat the battles of Austerlitz and Jena, and the peace of Tilsit, which seemed the deathblow of Germany.

SECTIONAL PARALYSIS OF CONGRESS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Why is it that one Congress after another fails to make provision for the reduction of the tariff? It is not because of ignorance of the needs of the country, nor of faith in the justness of the present tariff laws. Every member of Congress understands perfectly well that our tariff laws are totally inadequate to the needs of the country, and that the superabundance of money in the Treasury is a source of danger. But in the consideration of any measure of national importance there are two questions which every Congressman asks himself: First, what effect will it have on the fortunes of the political party to which he belongs; second, what will be the effect on the interests of the locality which he represents.

If we examine the more important measures which have become laws by the action of the Forty-ninth Congress, we shall find that no one of them had any special significance in party politics, nor greatly affected the interests of any locality. The "Presidential Succession Bill," the "Electoral Count Bill," the "Inter-State Commerce Bill," and the "Repeal of the Tenure of Office Act," were all measures which could be considered without prejudice, and their enactment showed that the Forty-ninth Congress were not wanting in ability or patriotism. But on the other hand, the "Pauper Pension Bill," the great number of private pension bills, and the "Texas Seed Bill," besides several bills for local appropriations, all of which were vetoed by the President, showed how ready Congressmen were to sacrifice their patriotism to political fears or local interests. If a man of less firmness and integrity than President Cleveland had been at the head of affairs, the record of this Congress would have been far less creditable than it is. Does not the history of the country show that the tendency of legislation is more and more to the neglect of national interests whenever questions arise where the interests of one section of the country are opposed to those of another? Who is there besides the President to reconcile conflicting interests?

The dangers of dissolution were set at rest for awhile, but were not removed, by the successful issue of the civil war. Is it not possible to diminish the danger by electing to Congress a number of members to represent not local nor State interests, but the interests of the country at large? Suppose that each political party, at Presidential elections, should nominate say thirty members at large, and that fifteen of each of two parties receiving the greatest number of votes should be elected for a term of years, we should have in Congress a body of men who would represent the United States, and who in times of great excitement, or of sectional controversy, would stand in the breach and ward off danger. The centre of population is moving westward at a rapid rate, new States are knocking for admission into the Union, and the time is not far distant when the population west of the Mississippi will rival that to the east. Who knows what new dangers will arise from sectional differences to threaten the safety of the Union? There should be some Representatives from the country at large to hold up the President's hands, and, amid the conflict of interests, to act for the welfare of the whole country.

JEFFERSON DAVIS AND REPUDIATION.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In answer to the inquiry of a correspondent in the last number of the Nation, permit me to say that there is ample authority for the statement that Jefferson Davis was a "repudiator."

In the Washington Daily Union for May 25, 1849, is a statement, signed by Jefferson Davis, in which he defends the right of Mississippi to repudiate the bonds in question, on the ground that they were issued in disregard of the Constitution of Mississippi. Here is a sample from the letter: "The crocodile tears which have been shed over ruined creditors are on a par with the baseless denunciations which have been heaped upon the State."

The London Times, July 13, 1849, in its money article, replied to Davis's letter, explaining the repudiation of the bonds from the creditors' point of view. To this reply Mr. Davis responded, August 29, 1849, in a long letter addressed to the editors of the Mississippian, in which he elaborated his arguments in favor of the repudiation, and denounced the article of the London Times in most violent terms. He further said: "With far more propriety might repudiation be charged on the English Government, for reduction of interest on her loans when she consolidated her debts; for the income tax which compels fund-holders to return a part of the interest they receive on their evidences of public debt, for the support of the Government which is their debtor."

In the United States Senate, also, Mr. Davis excused Mississippi for her repudiation. Also, on April 29, 1846, he moved an amendment to the Smithsonian Institution Bill, allowing Arkansas, under certain conditions, to repudiate her bonds.

A full account of Jefferson Davis's connection with repudiation, and the letters above referred to, can be found in three pamphlets by the Hon. Robert J. Walker, published in London in 1863-64.

Mr. Davis's connection with this matter has doubtless often been overstated. For example, Mr. John Stuart Mill, in an article on "The Contest in America" (Fraser's Magazine, 1862), said that "the President of the new Republic, Mr. Jefferson Davis, was the original inventor of repudiation. Mississippi was the first State which repudiated. Mr. Jefferson Davis was Governor of Mississippi; and the Legislature of Mississippi had passed a bill recognizing and providing for the debt, which bill Mr. Jefferson Davis vetoed." Though this may have no foundation (Mr. Davis, I believe, never having been Governor of Mississippi), the letters and statements given by Mr. Walker seem to show that Jefferson Davis cannot be defended from the charge of being a "repudiator." ALBERT T. PERKINS.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The consolation which you offer to the disappointed woman-suffragists of your State, in your number of March 17, will perhaps be increased by a few additional statistics from Massachusetts.

In 200 out of the 347 cities and towns of that State, not one woman has ever voted, though the right to do so has been granted for eight years past. In those towns where enthusiasm for the new privilege led its advocates to register and vote the first year, the number of women voters has steadily and greatly diminished with scarcely an exception. In the year 1885, as you observed, there was a decided gain in their vote in Boston, which was lost the following year. This experience of 1885 contains a moral. In that year an unusual effort was made by public and private appeal to call out the woman vote in favor of a so-called reform school-committee ticket differing from that of either political party. This special effort led to a vote of nearly 2,000 women; but when the result was declared, it appeared that a clear majority of these women voters had been sent to the polls by advocates of one of the regular party tickets, with the acknowledged purpose of offsetting the votes of the women reformers, and thus defeating the reform ticket, which they succeeded in doing.

This is a bit of history which is sure to repeat itself, and it ought greatly to console those who are grieved because they are not allowed to try the effect of women's votes upon questions of reform. It is interesting, also, to note that for the past four years every woman candidate for School Committee has been defeated, although for several years before school suffrage was granted to women they had been annually elected to that office. Thus it would appear that, by their entrance into school politics, women have driven themselves off the School Board in Boston. E. L.

DIVORCE STATISTICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: All lovers of discussion and legislation founded on a thorough knowledge of the facts involved will be glad to learn that Congress has recently appropriated $10,000 to the Bureau of Labor for the collection of statistics and other facts concerning the marriage and divorce laws of the country. The National Divorce Reform League has urged this measure upon Congress for more than three years, and the Senate has each year approved it, but it is only recently that certain members of the House have come to acknowledge its importance. In the hands of Mr. Carroll D. Wright this appropriation will undoubtedly bring a report of great value. It would seem indispensable to intelligent legislation upon our conflicting marriage and divorce laws.

CONVENTUAL PASTIMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: But a week after reading your review of Perey's memoirs of the Princesse de Ligne in the Nation, I discovered an account of pranks similar to hers, practised a hundred and fifty years before in the Carmelite Nunnery of Sainte-Marie; and they interested me so much that I send you a translation of the passage in question, which is cited by Livet in the preface to his 'Précieux et Précieuses,' from the 'Mémoires de la Duchesse de Mazarin.'

"As Mme. de Courcelles had been sent into the convent with me," writes the Duchess, "I was good-natured enough to join her in playing tricks upon the Sisters. Whereupon people made a thousand silly stories out of them to tell the King: that we put ink in the holy-water fount to daub [barbouiller] these worthy ladies; that we ran up and down through the dormitory at night with a pack of little dogs, crying out 'tayaut' [tally-ho!], and a quantity of other such things, either made up out of the whole cloth or greatly exaggerated. Under pretext of keeping us company, they watched us closely. For this office they selected the oldest of the Sisters as being most incorruptible; but by doing nothing but walk up and down all day, we very soon used them up, one after the other, until two or three were completely lamed from their determination to follow us."

These stories, although denied by those concerned in them, obtained a wide circulation at court, and appear to have been not without foundation. At any rate, until la Mère Angélique began her reforms at Port Royal in 1609, French convents were but too convenient retreats from the shadow of a great scandal; and their worldly visitors spent far more time in frivolity than in penitence, to the delight rather than the scandal of the younger Sisters.

Could our naïve little Princess have been reading Tallemant des Réaux, and got the idea of the joke from him? Or are such pranks the natural result of the ennui of a convent life?

JOHN COTTON AGAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A week or two ago I took occasion to point out an absurd blunder made by Mr. W. M. Fullerton in the Boston Sunday Record, whereby he announced that a certain edition of Theocritus was dedicated to the Rev. John Cotton, the Puritan minister of Boston at its first settlement. I strove to point out this error in a light and even tender mood, as being perhaps the vagary of a mind overburdened with knowledge, and finding dark allusions and mystic analogies where ordinary mortals were blind. But my tenderness was evidently misplaced, since in the Sunday Record for March 13 Mr. Fullerton has poured forth a column or more of special pleading and irrelevant nonsense, still maintaining that he was right.

His whole argument was based upon the dedication, which he prints as follows:

"Nobilitate, Virtute, Eruditione ac summa Humanitate conspicuo Viro,
D.D. JOHANNI COTTONO,
Equiti Aurato & Baronetto.
Maximo Literarum Literatorumque
Patrono, Domino suo benevolentissimo, ac summâ observantiâ in perpetuum colendo, Author S.P.D."

Relying upon the fourth line, Mr. Fullerton actually asks me to explain why Sir John Cotton, Bart., of Connington, should be called a "doctor of divinity"; for, he adds, "this D.D. does not seem to be satisfactorily intelligible unless it means doctor of divinity." He also gravely states that he considers the three letters at the end of the inscription, viz., S.P.D., to be a misprint for S.T.D., the usual contraction for Sacrosanctæ Theologiæ Doctori. I should very much like to see his translation of the whole sentence with these substitutions, and would especially ask him where his verb is to be found. I would also ask him if he ever before saw such a sentence in Latin or English, where the D.D. of a doctor of divinity preceded the personal name instead of following it.

But if Mr. Fullerton had condescended to make a little search of authorities, he would have found that the common-law Latin term for a knight is "miles," but the heralds usually use "eques," and for a knight bachelor "eques auratus." Moreover, the usual and proper prefix to the name of a knight is "dignissimus dominus," the equivalent for "most worshipful sir." Here, therefore, is just the explanation needed of the D.D. Finally, a competent authority assures me that the customary phrase at the end would be "salutem plurimam dicit."

Again, Mr. Fullerton translates the long dedication, closing with the words, "Debtor to your noble qualities, Georgius Sylvanus, P.M." He discovers another mare's nest here, and says that he thinks that P.M. stands for M.P., "member of Parliament." But a little search in the proper direction would have shown Mr. Fullerton that Georgius Sylvanus was the editor of divers classical works, and that he therein describes himself as "Pannonius Medicus," or "Hungarian Doctor," being evidently one of the wandering scholars seeking employment wherever learning could find a market.

Having thus easily and decisively cleared up the ridiculous mistakes of the critic, I will spare your readers a recital of the ludicrous errors made in his attempt to bolster up his case. They are not even ingenious, as may be inferred from his argument that we do not "certainly know that the Rev. John Cotton was not a baronet." This line of argument, of course, can be urged in regard to any man or any office. I do not certainly know that Mr. Fullerton is not the true Sir Roger Tichborne, though I feel quite confident that he does not teach Latin in any university nor occupy a position in Heralds' College in London. THE CHICAGO DEATH-RATE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The letter on "Results of Sanitary Inspections in Chicago," in No. 1133 of the Nation, gives data for only six years in regard to the mortality of that city. That period is too short to enable the reader to arrive at the best conclusions. As Mr. Bemis shows in his table, the death-rate in 1886 in Chicago was considerably lower than in 1881. But the value of his conclusion is neutralized somewhat by the fact that in the years 1859-62, 1865, 1867, 1875, and 1877-79, also, the death-rates were lower than in 1881. If we compare groups of years, we find that the average death-rate in Chicago for 1880-84 was 21.83, while for 1875-79 it was 18.51; showing that for the five years 1880-84 there was an actual increase, compared with the preceding five years, in the number of deaths to each 1,000 inhabitants. The following table for Chicago is of interest:

Years.	Average annual death-rate from all causes per 1,000 living.
1855-59	23.12
1860-64	18.83
1865-69	22.10
1870-74	23.70
1875-79	18.51
1880-84	21.83

My authority for these figures is an article by Erwin F. Smith on the "Influence of Sewerage, etc., on Death-rate in Cities," published by the Michigan State Board of Health. This pamphlet presents a vast amount of statistics compiled by Mr. Smith himself in a most painstaking manner.

While the death-rate of Chicago is undeniably low compared with that of other cities, yet the decline of its death-rate has not been so rapid as in New York or Brooklyn. I would refer to pages 138 and 139 of the pamphlet mentioned. St. Louis, while exhibiting a more marked decline in its death-rate, has also fewer deaths per 1,000 of her population than Chicago.

The general truth seems to be that the introduction of sewers and common water supplies into cities lessens the number of deaths from typhoid fever and kindred diseases, while it has little or no influence upon diphtheria, scarlet fever, and smallpox. This, in regard to diphtheria, etc., is contrary to the usual opinion; but it is demonstrated by Mr. Smith's paper. My present purpose, however, is to show that in a long time the number of deaths in Chicago from diphtheria has steadily increased. The same can be said of Boston, Baltimore, New York, Brooklyn, and St. Louis. As diphtheria is a "wave" disease, we must, to be accurate, make comparisons of the averages of groups of years. Thus in 1860–64, in Chicago, the average number of deaths from diphtheria per 10,000 inhabitants was 8.3; in 1880–84 it was 11.9.

For success in preventing sickness and death from the dangerous communicable diseases like diphtheria, something more than good sewers and pure water and general cleanliness must be relied upon. William Squire, M.D., of London, Eng., in the British Medical Journal of October 30, 1886, says:

"Diseases propagated by personal infection, such as scarlet fever and smallpox, have shown no diminution under our extensive sanitary works, but require measures of isolation for their control; they are not checked by the great improvements in drainage and water supply that have proved so efficacious against the prevalence of diarrhœal diseases, and especially in diminishing the amount of enteric fever. Both these points are proved in the reports of the Registrar-General."

This has a lesson for our boards of health. The prompt isolation of the patients, and the thorough disinfection of clothing, bedding, rooms, etc., are measures that should be enforced in cases of diphtheria and like diseases.—Yours truly,

H. M. H.

A CARELESS AUTHOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Prof. Laurie's recent book on 'The Rise and Early Constitution of Universities,' in Dr. Harris's "International Education" series, is so useful and so pleasantly written that it may seem hypercritical to indulge in any strictures upon matters which neither affect the general plan nor essentially contribute to the formation or elucidation of his views. At times, however, this work bears such marks of extreme haste in its composition, and the author's use of materials is so uncritical, that the thoughtful reader is likely to conceive a prejudice, and the authority of the book to be unduly weakened.

For example, we find the following on page 35: "Bede says, according to Newman, that in his time there were monks in England who knew Latin and Greek as well as they knew their mother tongue; but, according to Mullinger, this was said by him only of Albinus, who was taught Greek by Theodore." Is it not incredible that the Professor of the Institutes and History of Education in the University of Edinburgh should pen this statement without even taking down the 'Ecclesiastical History' from his library shelf, and endeavoring to effect a reconciliation between the two writers whom he quotes? Had he done so, he would have found (Hist. Eccl. iv, 2—I quote from Moberly's edition): "Indicio est quod usque hodie supersunt de eorum discipulis, qui Latinam Græcamque linguam æque ut propriam in qua nati sunt, norunt." This is, then, the authority for Newman's statement. Again (v, 20): "Albinus discipulus ejus qui monasterio ipsius in regimine successit, in tantum studiis scripturarum institutus est, ut Græcam quidem linguam non parva ex parte, Latinam vero non minus quam Anglorum, quæ sibi naturalis est, noverit." And thus Mullinger's assertion is substantiated. But not only is there no conflict between the views adduced: there is even a superfluity of evidence in favor of the main proposition. Thus (Hist. Eccl. v, 8): "Tobiam pro illo consecravit, virum Latina, Græca et Saxonica lingua atque eruditione multipliciter instructum." In v, 23, Bede again says of Tobias: "Cum eruditione litterarum vel ecclesiasticarum vel generalium, ita Græcam quoque cum Latina didicit linguam, ut tam notas ac familiares sibi eas quam nativitatis suæ loquelam haberet."

Prof. Laurie's orthography of proper names is sometimes peculiar. He writes now "Salerno," and now "Salernum"; always "St. Galle"; and always "Lancfranc," against the consensus of modern usage. Curiously enough, too, the "Cairo" of page 88 becomes "Babylon" on page 99, and in this he is followed by Dr. Harris (pp. xviii, xix), who must have been aware of their identity.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I should like to contribute one or two instances, in addition to those given by your correspondent in No. 1133 of the Nation, illustrative of the facility with which the surnames of foreigners—especially those of French origin—are transformed after settlement in rural New England.

Something like a quarter of a century ago two brothers, John and Louis Le Ware, from Canada, became residents of this town. Both have since raised large families here. John and his descendants have kept their original name (now written Leware). The family name of the other brother was long since transformed to Lovell, by which he and his posterity of two generations are so universally known, both in speech and writing, that the former name, now obsolete and forgotten, would not be recognized.

Fifteen years ago, perhaps, another Canadian Frenchman, Joseph Simoneau, settled here. This name was soon Anglicized into Simonds, by which the family are now almost universally known, although it is still occasionally written Simoneau. Before a generation has passed, however, the latter name will doubtless be wholly disused and forgotten.

Such instances as the above are curious illustrations of the habit of domination of the Anglo-Saxon mind, the world over, when brought into contact with other races, in moulding language, laws, manners, etc., into conformity to itself.

Notes.

THE completion, by Mr. Henry C. Lea, of the History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, to which he has closely devoted himself for many years, is a very gratifying event, both in the interest of American scholarship and as a sign of the author's restoration to health. Mr. Lea's originality of research and exposition is of a kind that leaves little scope to the reviewer. The date of publication is not yet determined.

Fords, Howard & Hulbert announce 'A Summer in England with Henry Ward Beecher,' by Maj. J. B. Pond, his travelling companion. There will be a photographic portrait frontispiece.

Thomas Whittaker will issue Canon C. A. Row's 'Future Retribution viewed in the Light of Reason and Revelation,' and the Rev. E. Hatch's 'Early History of Christian Institutions.'

Wm. S. Gottsberger will publish on March 26 'The Bride of the Nile,' a romance by Georg Ebers, from the German by Clara Bell, in two volumes.

James Pott & Co. have undertaken the sole agency for Bagster's Bibles in this country.

We have lately had from Geo. Routledge & Sons a sumptuous edition of 'Les Misérables' in English. Mr. W. R. Jenkins now proposes to make a new edition of the original French, manufactured wholly in this city in five duodecimo volumes. Mr. Jenkins has also in press 'La Lingua Italiana,' by Prof. T. E. Comba—a text-book in the "Natural Method"; 'Livre des Enfants,' a French primer, by Paul Bercy; and 'Contes tirés de Molière,' by Prof. Alfred M. Cotte, who has had Lamb's 'Tales from Shakspere' in mind as a model.

The American Economic Association announces 'The Relation of the State to Industrial Action,' by Prof. Henry C. Adams, professor of political economy in Cornell University and the University of Michigan, to be issued March 25.

Mr. Andrew Lang is editing the old English translation of 'Cupid and Psyche' (1566), to which he will prefix a paper on the transmigrations and transformations of the myth.

It is always well to know who did the historic deed which men incline to celebrate—for instance, who abolished slavery in the United States. Some say the Rev. George Bourne, because he first formulated immediate and unconditional emancipation. Some say Benjamin Lundy, because he first dropped everything else in order to labor for emancipation. Some think Garrison had a hand in it because he first organized the anti-slavery sentiment of the country on the basis of immediatism. Others think the genuine emancipator was the political abolitionist, say J. G. Birney and the Liberty party; or the Republican party, first to elect an anti-slavery Presidential candidate. John Brown paved the way for this success, say others still, and made a war for freedom inevitable. Lincoln, finally, did actually sign and utter the edict of emancipation. Here is choice enough, without mention of Mrs. Stowe and 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' But it is the object of a small pamphlet, 'The New-England Emigrant Aid Company, and its influence, through the Kansas contest, upon national history' (Worcester, Mass.), to call attention to the claims of its author (as the founder of the Company) to have been the first to knock the bottom out of the "peculiar institution." The lectures here reproduced were given before the Worcester Society of Antiquity, and are only the prelude to a larger work of the same purport. In it Mr. Thayer will doubtless settle the question of the interference of his patent right of killing slavery, by free-labor colonizing cordons, with that of Benjamin Lundy a quarter of a century earlier.

Two years ago Mr. Theo. L. DeVinne read a paper before the Grolier Club on 'Historic Printing Types'; and now two hundred copies of this lecture have just been printed for the Grolier Club at the author's own press. It is a delight to see a book whose mechanical execution is of so high an order, and whose literary quality is quite worthy of its beautiful setting. Mr. De Vinne traces the modifications of the movable letter from John Fust and Peter Schoeffer to the latest (and most ugly) novelties of the type-founders of to-day. He has adorned his broad and beautiful pages with an abundance of facsimiles and reproductions. Nowhere else can so much information on the subject be found collected together, but there is, nevertheless, a hope that Mr. De Vinne will expand his treatment in a larger work procurable (no doubt) by the public at large.

Uniform with Mr. DeVinne's book, the Grolier Club has also issued Mr. Robert Hoe's lecture on 'Book-Binding as a Fine Art,' illustrated by many examples from his own collection, reproduced by the Bierstadt process. We may note a strange slip on p. 7, where Mr. Hoe speaks of the MM. Marius Michel as "a Frenchman."

A new volume of vacation travels of the light, entertaining sort which seems to be an increasingly popular form of literature, is issued by Roberts Brothers, Boston, under the title 'Cathedral Days,' by Anna Bowman Dodd. It narrates the incidents of a driving tour through southern England. The writer takes a special interest in architecture, and gives a fuller account of the cathedrals seen than of anything else; but the text is by no means confined to such subjects—the landscape, the inns, the rustics, the fairs, and the country seats all receiving their share of attention. The journey was made in a "trap" with only one companion, and a good deal of its six weeks' pleasure has found its way into these pages.

The 'Satchel Guide to Europe' of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. reaches this year a sixteenth edition, with very slight and immaterial changes in its last year's contents.

Readers of Outing, our open-air sporting contemporary of excellent repute, will recognize familiar matter in 'Yachts and Yachting' (Cassell & Co.)—Capt. R. F. Coffin's history of American yachting, in six chapters to 1885; the Mayflower-Galatea races of 1886, by Charles E. Clay; American steam yachting, by Edward S. Jaffray; and British yachting, by C. J. C. McAlster. This record, not more comprehensive than convenient for reference, is fully illustrated, mostly by outline sketches by F. S. Cozzens and others.

Mr. Griswold's 'Annual Index to Periodicals [monthly or quarterly]' is now published (Bangor, Me.: Q. P. Index). It is divided into two parts, authors and subjects, reference to and from which is effected with characteristic ingenuity; but the liability to error is enormously increased by the use of such high numerals as 40,000 and its sequence, and Mr. Griswold may ultimately be driven to consider whether he is not paying too dearly for condensation.

Mr. Spofford's 'American Almanac for 1887' (Am. News Co.) rounds out its first decade. It remains the most varied and useful work of the kind in this country in the realm of statistical, financial, and political information.

Mr. T. W. Higginson has reprinted two short articles from the Atlantic and Harper's in a little Handbook, 'Hints on Writing and Speech Making' (Boston: Lee & Shepard), which is sure to find young readers in plenty, to whom its slight but practical suggestions will be welcome and stimulating.

From Lee & Shepard we have likewise a new edition of Whately's 'English Synonyms Discriminated,' or perhaps we should say a new issue.

A. C. Armstrong & Son put their imprint on a Glasgow edition of Cowper's translations of Mme. de la Mothe Guyon's religious poems, prettily manufactured without and within.

The third and final volume of the 'History of Woman Suffrage' (Rochester: Susan B. Anthony), covering the period from 1876 to 1885, has just been issued. Like its predecessors, it is abundantly supplied with steel portraits of the female advocates of the cause, and it also contains an index to the entire work.

We have the customary supply of Easter leaflets and booklets, each in its proper envelope: from D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, 'Easter Lilies' and 'Sunshine'; from A. D. F. Randolph & Co., the more elaborate 'Easter Lilies,' 'Heartsease,' 'Garden Graith, or Talks among My Flowers,' by Sarah F. Smiley, and 'In Blossom Time: Songs and Ballads of the Spring.' The last two are genuine books, very tastefully attired.

The accomplished translator of Mommsen's 'Roman History,' the Rev. W. P. Dickson, has given us the much desired translation of his fifth volume, and it has been republished by Charles Scribner's Sons. As the original three volumes are made into four in the translation, so the thick fifth volume is divided in two, and the difficulty of numbering them—in the uncertainty as to the bulk of the unpublished fourth volume—has been solved by publishing them with an independent title, 'The Provinces of the Roman Empire,' in two volumes. The maps are reproduced directly from the original, with German names and descriptions. Translation is one of the most difficult forms of composition, and Mr. Dickson is certainly very skilful in it. Occasionally, however, one meets with an expression which is inexact or obscure. For example, take the rendering of a sentence which is perfectly intelligible in the original, but which here (vol. i, p. 21) is far from being elegant or perspicuous—that the region submitted "probably in the form of a dependent principality emerging in the first instance, but of its prince ere long giving place to the imperial procurator, from whom, for that matter, he did not essentially differ."

The extraordinary vogue of Mr. Rider Haggard's 'She' has already invited parody in England, and a burlesque, called 'He,' has appeared. This is chiefly a satire on the attacks on the so-called "literary log-rollers." It is said to be by the author of 'Much Darker Days' (i. e., Mr. Andrew Lang) in collaboration with another humorist (probably Mr. "F. Anstey").

A well-conceived and well executed souvenir series of sketches of Westminster Abbey comes to us from S. Drewett, London (1 Northumberland Avenue, Trafalgar Square, W. C.). The artist, Mr. Alfred Dawson, here contributes six water-color drawings, reproduced, as we judge, by photogravure, with the general effect of etchings and almost of photographs. A very true sense of the picturesque has determined his choice of subjects, which include three exterior views of the Abbey, the interior of the nave, the Poets' Corner, and the doorway of the chapel dedicated to St. Erasmus. Other sketches are to follow. Their scale is about three by four-and-a-half inches. Miss Bradley, daughter of the Dean of Westminster, furnishes a brief descriptive text.

The Studio for March fulfils its promise to present its subscribers with an etching, made expressly for that journal by Mr. Sidney L. Smith, after a pastel portrait of the boy John Quincy Adams, at the age of sixteen. This portrait was drawn by one Schmidt at the Hague, and his work is praised by the editor of the Studio for great delicacy and refinement. To have preserved this pleasing memorial of one who, if not to be called the greatest of American Presidents, was certainly the best equipped of all the line for such an office, is a service to his countrymen. The boy's expression is roguish, and is heightened by his costume, which is that of a "little man" of the period.

M. Charles Yriarte continues his account of the treasures of Chantilly in L'Art for February 15 (Macmillan). There are numerous illustrations after Poussin, Watteau, etc., including Mignard's portrait of Molière. The Princess Demidoff's gallery furnishes a fine open-air landscape ("On the Meuse") by J. Wynants, which has been etched full-page by G. Greux.

The Supplement to the Nouvelle Revue of February 15 contains the beginning of what promises to be an extremely charming story by Dostoyevsky, 'Les nuits blanches.' The nights at that period of the summer when the sun does not set till after nine o'clock, and rises about one in the morning, have received this name in St. Petersburg. The title seems significant, not only for the material setting of the story, but for the moral condition of the two actors. So far, it is almost gay and happy, while showing all the strange power of mental and moral revelation to which the author has accustomed us.

Our readers have often heard from us concerning the social-reform movement of M. Le Play which is exercising so salutary an influence in France. Its organ, La Réforme Sociale, a fortnightly journal, contains, in its issue for January 1, an article by M. Claudio Jannet, entitled "L'ancien régime en Amérique"—a study of the institutions of the early settlers, based principally upon the publications of the Johns Hopkins University. The writer starts from the assertion of De Tocqueville that the American colonies had a new conception of society and a new type of institutions, and undertakes to show that, on the other hand, the institutions of these colonists were the direct outgrowth of those of the mother country—a view familiar enough to us at the present day, but perhaps a novel one to Frenchmen. Probably nothing is so hard for a Frenchman (or a European in general, for the matter of that) to understand as that English and American liberties are founded upon law and precedent, and not upon vague generalizations. The extravagances and aberrations which the writer cites at the beginning of his article, as accompanying the Protestant Reformation, can be easily matched in Catholic countries. It is not any form of belief, but the existence of a healthy conservatism in the national temper, and a habit of self-reliance, that protect against such extravagances. It is noteworthy that the illustrations of the ancien régime described in this article are mainly taken from Protestant colonies.

The Revue Scientifique for March 5 contains an interesting account of the valley of the Obi, by M. Ch. Rabot, founded on the work of the Italian traveller, Stephen Sommier, 'Un' Estate in Siberia.' From this it appears that the northern forest limit is receding in Asia as in Europe. According to the author's theory this is due, not to the increase of cold or the violence of winds, but to the saturation of the soil. He believes that since the glacial age there have been successive periods of dryness and humidity, and that the forests which have grown in the one are succeeded by mosses in the other. In support of this view he points out the fact that trees are still to be found in places where there is drainage. Descriptions are given of the summer and winter dwellings of the Ostiaks and Samoyeds, who constitute the principal part of the scanty population, their dress, religion, and marriage customs. The Ostiaks have a special cult for the dead, making an image of one who has died, which they treat in every respect as if it were a living person. They are also believers in spirits, and have mediums whom they always consult before any transaction of importance.

The paper of most general interest in the last number of Petermann's Mitteilungen is upon the journey of Messrs. Capello and Ivens across Africa. They left the west coast in April, 1884, having for their main objects the discovery of a trade route to connect the Portuguese possessions on the Atlantic with those on the Indian Ocean, and the determining of the watershed between the Congo and the Zambesi. In neither of these do they appear to have been successful. On reaching the latter river in longitude 24° they proceeded in a northeasterly direction, hoping to gain the east coast by the way of Lake Tanganyika. Disappointed in this by the hostility of the natives, they were obliged to return to the Zambesi, which they followed to the coast. Although little of the territory traversed was new, the numerous observations taken, the careful mapping of their route, and the large collections made of the fauna, flora, and geology of the interior have given the expedition a high scientific value. An admirable map accompanies the paper. Prof. Fischer completes his account of the changes in the North-African coast, and Prof. Kunze contributes a paper, chiefly tables of observations, on the barometric hypsometry of South America.

By royal decree of Feb. 20, a new and complete edition of the works of Galileo will be published under the auspices of the Italian Minister of Public Instruction, in twenty quarto volumes of about 500 pages each. The task will consume ten years.

We read in the Courrier de l'Art that Fanny Zampini Salazaro, daughter of Demetrio Salazaro, the historian of the monuments of southern Italy, has just started La Rassegna degl' interessi femminili, whose mission will be to promote not political, but industrial and artistic emancipation and expansion for women. She has the cordial approval of Prof. R. Bonghi.

Recently announced in Italy are an enlarged edition, revised with the aid of fresh documents, of Prof. Villari's 'Savonarola'; the fifteenth volume of Mazzini's writings, with Saffi's invaluable preface; a new volume of poems by Carducci.

A "bloody shirt" campaign document of the late German elections is before us, and shows how the war string was pulled. A folding sheet has on one of the inner pages a map of the Franco-German frontier, with great red squares dotted over the French territory, marked "120,000 men," as at Paris, or 17,500, as at Belfort, or 18,250 at Nancy, etc.—showing, in fact, the disposition of French forces and strongholds with reference to a possible invasion of Germany. On the opposite page are odious tabulated and graphic comparisons of the military strength in peace and war of the two countries, and much other information creating a belief in the hostile intentions of the French. This compilation is professedly made from the official sources enumerated by Maj. E. von Tröltsch, of the Würtemberg army, and is modestly published "im Auftrag der Deutschen Partei." There is no other allusion to the pending elections.

— The April Atlantic opens in a novel way with the familiar features of Dr. Holmes, whose portrait is fitly the first to appear in the magazine to which he gave the name at its christening, and in whose fortunes he is fond of manifesting a paternal interest. He continues in this number the diary of his English visit, in which there is nothing more pleasing to the reader than the evident pleasure he himself took in it; though the cuckoo's note in Windsor Forest is a kind of prose poem. The poet of this month, however, is Whittier, whose verses on the conversion of the Indian chief Rain-in-the-Face to the arts of peace breathe that Christian gratulation and hope which entitle him to be called our sacred poet as no one besides is. An interesting paper of Lincoln reminiscence is given by "Edmund Kirke," who in the summer of 1864 published in this magazine an account of an interview with Jefferson Davis, to show that peace was impossible except with disunion. The present article narrates the events that led up to that interview—the hallucination of Col. Jaquess that Providence had chosen him to be a mediator through the Southern Methodist Church, Lincoln's relation to the affair, and subsequently his sending the writer unofficially with Jaquess to sound Davis, for the purpose of showing the North that reunion was not then feasible, as the peace advocates asserted. Lincoln dictated conditions of peace which the writer took down from his lips, among which were an indemnity of five hundred millions for the slaves, amnesty, and immediate representation in the Government on the basis of the voting population. The affair will not bear much emphasis, since it never came into a practical or serious shape. Nothing is more striking in it than the contrast between the large space it filled in the eyes of the actors and the small arc it really occupied in Lincoln's commanding view of the situation. At every step he was in a position to disown it or to avail himself of it, and in fact made use of it to "draw" the enemy for political effect on Northern opinion. As an episode it illustrates his character, but as history it contains only conjectures of events in the settlement of which other methods would have been required, and great forces would have worked with profound modification. A good many people besides McClellan were engaged in personally "saving the country" in those days, and Lincoln gave them every chance.

—The Harvard Monthly for March has a letter from Mr. Hamerton reviewing some exceptions taken by Col. Higginson, in an earlier number, to the former's remarks in the Atlantic, that literary celebrity is powerful only over a few, and that he would as willingly be overshadowed by an English lord as by an American millionaire. Col. Higginson holds that in this democratic country literary celebrity is powerful over the many, and that the author is not at a social disadvantage with the millionaire. Mr. Hamerton mildly replies that "the form of government has nothing to do with the reading habit," and cites France, as a democracy, to offset the United States, and Italy, as a monarchy, to balance England and Germany, etc. He apparently still believes that here, as in Europe, an author obtains an audience by a process of natural selection from all possible readers, and this audience, according to his individual observation, is constituted of "a few" in the cases of Victor Hugo, Thackeray, Ruskin, and Arnold; they were known, but not read in proportion to their fame. As to the relative estimation of literary celebrity and such visible things as wealth and rank, he clearly remains in an unbelieving state, maugre Col. Higginson's report. The discussion is not very fruitful. Col. Higginson relies for his main point on the vast circulation of journals and magazines; but the portion of their contents which Mr. Hamerton would regard as literature is very small, and it is plain from his instances that Col. Higginson confers the degree of "literary celebrity" with no academical hand. One thing the latter points out with marked emphasis, in contradiction to the conditions in England—namely, that literary men here count for nothing in the universities; but he has Harvard especially in mind.

—In the February number of Les Lettres et les Arts (Paris: Boussod, Valadon et Cie.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons) the article to which most readers will turn with the greatest expectation is the one by M. Caro: "Les dernières années de George Sand, d'après sa correspondance." It is not surprising that, for readers of the correspondence itself, M. Caro should scarcely have fulfilled the anticipations to which his own name, as well as his subject, has given rise; still, his long article is interesting even to those to whom the whole is familiar ground. He sketches with a few light strokes the first George Sand, as he calls her, the legendary George Sand of the Quartier Latin, the untiring wanderer over all the highways of Europe, especially those of Bohemia, accentuating the picture by a summary of Alfred de Musset's 'Merle blanc'; but he depicts with care the second George Sand, the George Sand of the peaceful later years at Nohant, as she appears in her correspondence with the authors who were her friends. M. Caro has not attempted to give any idea of these letters, not even of those to Flaubert, upon which he dwells the longest; but, within the narrow limits of the space at his disposal, he does show something of her methods of work and of her conceptions of literary art, and especially of her sympathetic and helpful goodness of heart, and the maternal charm of her relations with all who approached her, which makes her, even for those who know her only through her writings, one of the most gratefully and tenderly loved of authors. Among the illustrations is a small reproduction of Calamatta's portrait of 1836, and an excellent full-page one of Couture's well-known picture of 1850, thus showing M. Caro's first and second George Sand. Another noticeable article, "Opera buffa, opera seria," by M. Armand de Pontmartin, reads like a chapter from some future volume of "Mes Mémoires," of which the first, 'Enfance et Jeunesse' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof), was published last year. In this paper he recalls the winter, or rather the spring, of 1830, the last of the Restoration, the interval between the great theatrical battles of the Classics and Romantics over "Hernani," and the Revolution of July. The prettiest illustrations in the number are the picturesque Nuremberg views in the continued story of Mme. Thérèse Bentzon, "À la Sirène."

—The eighth edition of W. W. Story's 'Roba di Roma,' in two neat volumes (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), describes a Rome that has passed away under his own eyes. The revision to which it has been subjected consists of the recurring foot-note that "all this is changed now," the matter having been originally written more than a quarter of a century ago; but this book remains historically one of the very best pictures of both the scenes and the sentiment of Roman life. The author is inclined to lament the ruin of the picturesque and the incursion of the last barbarians, but sensibly concedes that the reform is usually for the good of the nation and the people. The pifferari have vanished and ballad-singers are rare; the beggars are restricted, the cabmen have a tariff, the slaughtering of cattle is banished without the walls; the Villas Ludovisi, Massimo, and Negroni are gone, and the railway station and the Via Nazionale have come. The Colonna Gardens are disappearing to make way for "blocks," and now the Villa Borghese, it is threatened, must follow these. The Piazza Navona is no longer flooded for its carnival; the Ghetto submits to sanitary inspection beyond the annual visit of Father Tiber; the great processions, and illuminations, and benedictions of St. Peter suffer eclipse, but the theatres rejoice in gas; costume goes out and fashion arrives; and for a good deal of this Mr. Story expresses sympathetic regret. But read his long chapter on the Ghetto, and one rejoices that Christian iniquity is now ancient, too; and so of many other things. The change in the conduct of funerals and the care of the dead is a great gain in itself, to say nothing of the living. Mr. Story observes that suicide has come in with liberty, and also cruelty to animals, though he ascribes this last to the presence of the carters and other laborers gathered there because of the building operations, and also to bad customs remediable by law. But, all told, one execrates the papal rule and blesses Italy with a good conscience, and bids New Rome god-speed, villas or no villas. Mr. Story's book is not confined to Rome, but makes little excursions into the country, or even as far as to Siena. The charm of the Campagna was never more feelingly described, and the nature of the Italians never more amiably and benevolently illustrated. In fact, Mr. Story loves them so much that he can never repress a sneer at the French, English, and Americans to their advantage. On page 145 we observe an account of Iphigeneia's dream which indicates that the author had not recently read the play in Euripides; and, on page 168, sentimental mention of a visit of Shelley to Severn, which is mythical.

— Strange as it may seem, there have never been but two editions of Pascal's complete works, although his 'Provinciales' and his 'Pensées' have been reprinted almost a countless number of times. Indeed, if the matter were pressed closely, the two editions would resolve themselves into one work, for that of 1819 is little more than a reproduction of the one of 1779. A couple of very cheap reprints which purport to reproduce these do not deserve to be considered. But now the publishing house of Hachette has at last begun, in the collection known as "Les Grands Écrivains," an edition of Pascal which promises to be more complete than any hitherto issued. The editor, M. Prosper Faugère, is a veteran in Pascal literature. As early as 1844 he gave an edition of the 'Pensées,' which was a revelation as to what the original text really was. And now he returns to what was "one of the first admirations" of his youth. The first volume of his 'Blaise Pascal' (Paris: Hachette; Boston: Schoenhof), just published, contains only the first twelve "Provinciales," which he reproduces, not from any previous edition, but from a manuscript in his own possession, which he surmises to have been made about the year 1659, three years after the publication of the first letter. In this manuscript M. Faugère finds readings and minute changes in which he thinks he sees the correcting hand of Pascal. He therefore chooses it for his text, giving at the bottom of the page all the different readings of other editions. As to other notes, the new editor is very sparing in his information, and in this respect the present edition of Pascal will be very unlike those of the other great writers in the same collection. Indeed, except for the general appearance of the volume, it does not seem to be made on the same plan as the excellent editions of Saint-Simon, Corneille, Mme. de Sévigné. Yet where can a reader be more in need of appropriate notes than in reading the 'Provinciales,' full as they are of allusions to disputes about what were burning questions in 1656, and now are as things of a remote antiquity?

— M. Ernest Havet, whose edition of Pascal's 'Pensées' holds so high a rank, has now published 'Les Provinciales' (Paris: Delagrave; Boston: Schoenhof). He has chosen for his text the primitive version of the Letters, as they were published, one by one, beginning in January, 1656. His reason for not following the example of other editors, who have reproduced the last edition, corrected and revised by Pascal himself, is, that the 'Lettres Provinciales,' owing to their polemical and aggressive character, are to be considered in the same light as newspaper articles. The corrections made when they were collected into a volume were made by the author often to satisfy others rather than himself, so that the present editor may well say: "It was rather Port-Royal than Pascal that published these letters." M. Havet has not thought it well to reproduce the orthography, and he has, in every case, given the readings of subsequent editions at the foot of the page. The long introduction of eighty-nine pages gives all the information necessary for a full understanding of the Letters, each of which is in turn followed by several pages of remarques, on the language as well as on the subject matter. M. Havet is no friend of the Jesuits, as may be seen whenever he has occasion to speak of the order; nor is his edition wholly favorable to the Port-Royal side of the questions discussed. The doctrines of grace and predestination find little favor in his sight, and this he shows, even in the school edition he has prepared of Letters 1, 4, 13, 14 (Paris: Delagrave; Boston: Schoenhof). In these the comments are such that perhaps the Municipal Council of Paris itself might accept them. We have, therefore, in M. Havet's edition of the 'Provinciales' an extended historical and literary commentary; the first published in France which is prompted neither by the Jansenists nor by the Jesuits.

—'Academica Juventus: Die deutschen Studenten nach Sprache und Sitte, lexicographisch, histo- und anthropologisch dargestellt von Herodotus junior aus Halikaparnass' (Celle and Leipzig: August Schulze. 1887) is written throughout in a very facetious vein, which at times becomes somewhat tiring. But those uninitiated in the mysteries of German student-life will find in its pages much to amuse and instruct them. The booklet will also supplement the knowledge of many Englishmen and Americans, who, while studying in Germany, did not assiduously attend the Kneipe, or otherwise come into very close contact with the students. In the Preface the author speaks of his work as a contribution to the "natural history" of the German student, to remind alumni of joyous days long past, and to serve as a guide to the young student about to enter the unknown civitas academica. The information contained in the book is arranged alphabetically. Here are a few of the many words and customs that are explained: Angströhre, Belegbogen, Blume, Brüderschaft, Burschenschaft, Collegienbuch, Commers, Famos, Bemoostes Haupt, Altes Haus, Immatrikulieren, Katzenjammer, Kneipe, Landmannschaft, Mensur, Philister, Prosit, Salamander. Subjoined are a few definitions that are doubtless new to many Americans: a broom (Besen) is a servant-girl or waitress; to call a person learned (Gelehrter) is, according to the canons of beer-etiquette, an insult, which must be duly revenged; a coat is said to "learn Hebrew" when it is pawned; holzen means to beat; a student "lies in the basket" when he is confined to his room on account of a duel on the "Mensur"; "to ox" (ochsen, büffeln) is to study hard; old sack (alter Sack) = old friend, 'old fellow'; moss (Moos) is a paternal remittance of money; sausage ("Es ist mir Wurst")=indifferent. If "Herodotus junior" had treated the subject more seriously, and devoted more attention to student customs, he would have added very much to the value of his book.

MAUDSLEY ON THE SUPERNATURAL.

Natural Causes and Supernatural Seemings. By Henry Maudsley, M.D., LL.D. London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.; New York: Scribner & Welford. 1886. 8vo, pp. viii, 368.

Dr. Maudsley, after his early successes, undertook years since the rôle of a sort of Polonius among psychologists. His latest works show that he is still advancing in a knowledge of his part. Insufferably long sermons, full of rambling and disordered references to Saint Theresa, to the insane, to the confessions of St. Augustine, to the fallacy of human testimony, to the shortness of human life, to the Hindu devotees, to cerebral physiology, to poetry, to metaphysics, to altruism, and to the hallucinations of Swedenborg—such, of late years, are Dr. Maudsley's contributions to science. The present volume is a rather extreme case of this abuse of the privileges of a distinguished position. Because Dr. Maudsley was, not so very long ago, a leading expositor of modern psychology, why must he now deem himself called upon to harangue the world in this dull and useless fashion about the evils of superstition, the terrors of the dark ages, and the sinfulness of mankind? When we want to be scolded, are there not old-fashioned preachers enough in existence to do it for us, if we will but go to their churches? Must a reputed leader of thought waste his time in this fashion? And if he persists in doing so, must we not ere long begin to doubt the soundness of his reputation itself?

In the seventeenth century, Dr. Maudsley's train of thought, as we find it expressed in this book, would indeed have been more useful. His refutation of witchcraft would have been in place, his triumphant exposure of the doctrine of signatures might have done good, his views about general philosophy would have been worthy of even an enlightened thinker of the time, and the tone of this treatise would thus have been more in harmony with some of the most valuable tendencies of the century. Addressing as he does this age, Dr. Maudsley has to be judged not by his matter but by his style, for he says nothing that is now in the least needed by those who are capable of understanding him. His style in this volume, however, is a hopeless mixture of the commonplace and the confused. It is at times almost incoherent. It is never worthy of his former fame.

The present volume may indeed have been suggested by the existence and the baleful influence of the English Society for Psychical Research. That organization has undoubtedly made more than one bad blunder in the conduct of its work. Intelligent and severe criticism it certainly ought to receive. But Dr. Maudsley here offers nothing that can be called either intelligent, or, for sensible readers, severe, criticism of any present and genuine investigations into anything by anybody, unless the commonplaces of his first two chapters, wherein the simplest of the well known fallacies of induction are diffusely and solemnly set forth and blamed, can be called such criticism. In all save these first chapters, he tells us how the human imagination must be kept within bounds, how persons of nervous temperament are subject to hallucinations, how such hallucinations have in the past influenced religions, how all religious ecstasy is more or less abnormal, and how, in general, supposed supernatural interference in human affairs must be traced to some form of human delusion. All this, mingled with reflections as aforesaid, makes up Dr. Maudsley's argument. Superstition is, he assures us, pathological in its origin and highly injurious in its individual and social consequences. Hence we should actually go so far as to eschew superstition. We should even believe that we "come into being by natural laws, and by no other laws." We "must be convinced of the futility of pouring forth lamentations and supplications to invisible powers"; and after this there must occur an "evolution of the living sentiment of human solidarity," whereby the world will be saved and religion replaced. Beyond this rather familiar and ancient diet, the reader of Dr. Maudsley's book will find in it no mental food worth talking about.

To a writer of Dr. Maudsley's position, however, is of course due a report of the contents of his book, although we can give no space to detailed discussion. After a summary "Statement of the Argument," the author goes on, in Part I (pp. 7-145), to discuss the "fallacies incident to the natural operations of the mind." These are, in chapters i and ii, the regular fallacies of induction, restated and illustrated; while, in chapter iii, the activity of the imagination is similarly treated. The result of the argument, so far, is to show that a false belief in supernatural agencies can spring up through these relatively normal fallacies. In Part 2, "Unsound Mental Action," as a source of belief in the supernatural, is discussed in five chapters (pp. 149-261). Part 3 is devoted to the explanation and demolition of "The Attainment of Supernatural Knowledge by Divine Illumination," and contains seven chapters. The normal causes of error, and the much more potent abnormal sources of human delusion, having now been discussed, the author proceeds (p. 354, sq.) to summarize his results. "Malobservation and misinterpretation of nature" are the sources of all belief in the supernatural; and supernatural phenomena "have not ever been, nor are ever now, events of the external world, but have always been, and are, fables of the imagination." These are Dr. Maudsley's highly novel conclusions.

One curious problem, however, as we feel impelled to add, remains in this, as in Dr. Maudsley's previous books, wholly unsettled; and that problem concerns the author's personal views about the worth of life. If in the midst of these sermons of Dr. Maudsley's we were not always meeting with lamentations concerning human misery, and even with grave suggestions that the life of man is once for all a vain show, we should never think of vexing ourselves with Dr. Maudsley's opinions upon so metaphysical a topic. But the frequent occurrence of certain remarks in our author's writings has aroused in us a certain languid curiosity such as we cannot manage to feel concerning anything else that Dr. Maudsley of late years has chosen to mention. In his 'Body and Will' we seem to remember a passage where he declares pessimism to be a pathological phenomenon, a symptom of initial mental decay. We also seem to remember another passage where he confessed that, on the whole, he was a pessimist himself. The combination of these passages, as we remember them, has always produced in us a bewildered impression; and we have looked with interest to the present discussion for more light. We fail to get it. Dr. Maudsley sometimes hopes much of "human solidarity," and at such moments thinks that this "solidarity" will make us a very happy folk indeed some day, if it only becomes the triumphant principle of human nature. But, in other passages, he appears once for all to despair of us, now and hereafter. There seem to be, he tells us (p. 240), three classes of persons taking "leading parts in the great drama of human life." These are the "dupes," the "dupers," and the "duped dupers." He defines all three classes at some length. The "dupes," namely, believe "the great drama of human life" to possess "transcendent importance"; they "take it in tragical earnest," and are "ready to sacrifice strength and wealth and even life in its service." That, in fact, is what makes them dupes. The "dupers" are the actors and hypocrites of the world; the "duped dupers" are the people who, like certain reformers, combine selfishness with earnestness, and so become a kind of sincere impostors. These, then, are the typical men of this planet. As for the value of life under such circumstances, Dr. Maudsley admits (p. 143) that, "to the race, as to the individual, wisdom cannot fail to bring disillusion, and increase of knowledge to be increase of sorrow." He especially associates this "increase of sorrow" with the decline of supernaturalism. And, on page 145, he admits that good and heroic deeds, viewed from a standpoint outside the life of man, "may not be of any more moment than the devoted zeal and self-sacrifice of a toiling ant in the busy service of its colony." In short, to judge from all these passages, and others as well, Dr. Maudsley is an out-and-out pessimist.

Yet, on p. 362, we hear of an "enthusiastic optimist" who believes that "incalculable gains" and that "a vast height of power and happiness" await mankind whenever we shall have gotten rid of all forms of superstition. This person is even called, on p. 363, a "scientific optimist," and Dr. Maudsley seems for the instant to sympathize strongly with his glowing hopes. These are of a kind often referred to elsewhere by Dr. Maudsley; but he leaves all such hopes withered at last when he says, in the last sentence of his book, that whatever man is destined to become, we can hardly help feeling the conviction that it were something better for man "not to be, at the cost of what he has been, is still, and must continue to be in the long and painful process" of reaching the highest development. We see, then, how deeply Dr. Maudsley suffers from that "conviction of the utter vanities of all things under the sun," which, in 'Body and Mind,' he classes among the "forewarning intimations of inevitable decline and death," and distinctly calls a "malady of self-consciousness." Nay, this conviction he even names, in the cited passage, together with "thin and shrieking sentimentalities" and "metaphysical disquisitions," as among the prominent ills of modern life. But still, after all, we will not lose hope for Dr. Maudsley. May he quickly recover from all "maladies of self-consciousness," and long escape any more "forewarning intimations." But may he also never again write such a book as this one on the "Supernatural."

THE STORY OF KASPAR HAUSER.

Kaspar Hauser: Eine neugeschichtliche Legende. Von Antonius von der Linde. 2 vols. Wiesbaden. 1887.

EVERY one knows the story of Kaspar Hauser; all have been moved to pity at the tale of his confinement in a small dark cell without room to walk or stand—sitting there day and night from early infancy until his seventeenth year; shut off from all the world except the monster who gave him his daily bread, and the companionship that two wooden horses could afford him. Suddenly taken from this living death, he is deserted in the streets of Nuremberg with a letter to a cavalry captain in his hand. Thrown into prison as a helpless wayfarer, he becomes an object of curiosity, and, through the publication of his wonderful story by the Burgomaster, of hero-worship. Thousands travelled to see the "child of Nuremberg." Princes and noblemen paid him tribute. It became the fashion for ladies to dote on him. Scientists studied him as the embodiment of nature's most hidden secrets. Educators hailed him as the realization of Rousseau's Émile. Philanthropists made him the object of their special care. His wonderful story was translated into all civilized languages, and it was proposed to adopt him as the child of Europe. And yet all this honor, this attention, this pity, and this study was worse than misplaced—it was ridiculous. The history of popular delusions has been enriched in the nineteenth century by a deception no less thorough than the South Sea Bubble or the divine claims of the mesmeric fluid. The story of Kaspar Hauser is a myth. How did the myth arise? To answer this question Herr von der Linde has written two large volumes—on the whole, much too honorable a tombstone for Kaspar Hauser.

The facts of the case are brief and direct. They are recorded in the official protocol of the district courts on the few days following the lad's appearance in Nuremberg (May 26, 1828) before the "child of nature" myth was invented. This testimony is duly attested and registered; not a single authentic fact was ever added to it. From here on, the story rests only upon Kaspar's own narrations, suggested to him by the stupid credulity of his questioners and by the love of notoriety. From the official records we learn that Kaspar spoke with strong dialectical peculiarities, walked nearly a mile through the city, wrote his name, recited the Lord's Prayer, said that he had gone to school, showed his fondness for horses; and that by means of the letter which he presented on his appearance in Nuremberg he wanted to be enrolled as a trooper. For the rest, he feigned simple-mindedness to avoid inquiry into his antecedents, and answered all inconvenient questions with "Don't know." The justice recorded the suspicion that the fellow was a simulator. The letter is so framed as to block all inquiry and to quiet suspicion. It says that the boy has been kept in the house all the time, and no one knows of his existence; that he has no money, does not know where he came from, and wants to be a trooper; and that his handwriting is just like that of the writer of the letter. In it is contained a note purporting to have been written sixteen years previously by the mother of the child, but, as was afterwards proved by experts, written on the same paper, with the same ink, by the same hand. As a disguise, it was written in Latin characters. Both epistles are full of dialectic peculiarities and gross errors in grammar and spelling, many of which are repeated in Kaspar's later exercises. This is about all that was known of him. On the basis of this the rumor spread like fire that a wild boy, who did not know who he was or where he came from, was confined in the tower. Every one came to see him, and added to the wonder. He knows nothing of his childhood; ergo, he has been cut off from all humanity; ergo, he is a wild child of nature; ergo, he cannot talk or understand language; ergo, he is an innocent babe; ergo, he is a curiosity. Kaspar accepted the rôle, kept himself as passive and as stupid as possible, and in a few days was buoyed up into fame in an atmosphere of wonder and credulity. Only five days after his appearance Dr. Preu announces that "this lad is neither crazy nor idiotic, but has evidently been violently estranged in the most shameful manner from all human and social culture. . . . He is like a half-wild man brought up in the woods. . . ."

Meanwhile Kaspar was making gigantic strides towards civilization. Though at first he could only blurt out the most simple questions, and could understand only such as treated him like an infant, yet in three days he performed on the piano, soon afterwards knitted a stocking, and, before five weeks were over, had been able to inform the Burgomaster of his entire history. This the Burgomaster published in a long proclamation (33,000 words), in which the whole story is told from the point of view of the "wild boy of nature," and every suggestion of Kaspar's elaborated and expounded as gospel truth. This proclamation, though afterwards amplified and embellished with all the fantastic additions and details that credulity and vivid imagination could furnish, is the real source of the Kaspar Hauser Myth. Had this enterprising Burgomaster waited for the answer of the superior court to which he had submitted the document, he would have learned "that in the official records there was not even the slightest trace" of all this myth; that "the whole story was full of mythical and improbable circumstances as well as of inexplicable contradictions," and so on. But all this came too late.

Kaspar was put into the hands of a Prof. Daumer to be educated. Daumer was author of works on the 'Glory of the Holy Virgin,' 'The Fire and Moloch Worship of the Hebrews,' and on the 'Anthropophagism of the Apostles.' Under this master in one month Kaspar became a model of social elegance, playing at chess and checkers, carrying on witty conversations by the hour, making graceful allusions to the ancient Romans, and yet withal as innocent as a babe. The child of nature proves to be "a sensitive." It is observed that he sees a gnat in a spider's web at a considerable distance long after twilight; recognizes persons by their walk at incredible distances; distinguishes between an apple, a pear, and a plum tree by the smell of their leaves when others can scarcely see the trees, and is overpowered by the odors of a graveyard several streets off. Nay, more, he is a magnetic sensitive. He distinguishes all sorts of metals by their attractions for his fingers, and finds a needle in the same way. A hardware shop causes the most violent shudderings and contortions. He is even made an unimpeachable witness to the truth of homœopathy, the profession of the experimental Dr. Preu.

What more than anything else served to keep afloat the belief in Kaspar's story were the (supposed) attempts to murder him. The first occurred on October 17, 1829, under such circumstances as to leave him the sole witness in the case. He reported that the monster who confined him had attacked him and fled. The surgeons, on examining the wound and hearing Kaspar's story, reported that the wound was self-inflicted, probably with a razor. Of course, afterwards, village gossips remembered to have seen a suspicious man just at the right time, but no arrest was made. The evidence is completed by the fact that on the morning of this day Daumer and Kaspar had their first falling out. Kaspar was caught in a lie—a circumstance repeatedly observed by the more sensible members of Daumer's family. "Though his (Kaspar's) soul was filled with a childish kindness and gentleness, which rendered him incapable of hurting a worm or a fly, much less a man; though his conduct in all the various relations of life showed that his soul was spotless, and pure as the reflex of the eternal in the soul of an angel," yet he told a lie—in fact, so many of them that even Daumer had to admit it, and characteristically attributes the fall to the eating of meat.

In consequence of this and other circumstances, Kaspar was removed to Anspach, to the house of a teacher, Meyer, through the patronage of the Earl of Stanhope, who had adopted Kaspar as his son. Meyer recognized in him the realization of Munchausen,* as Daumer had of Émile. Kaspar felt the change of atmosphere, and knowingly adapted himself to it by no longer affecting supernatural sensibility or talking like a madman; but it was of no avail. Meyer's patience gave out, and he told Kaspar that his true character would be revealed to Stanhope. This was the occasion of the second attack, in which the circumstantial evidence against him was even more decisive than before. Kaspar came running home with a wound in his side, and, by pantomime, forced Meyer to return with him to the scene of attack (some distance off), in order to secure a silk bag which the supposed murderer had given him. In the bag was a note (such as no one intent on crime would write) written in mirror-script on paper such as was found torn out of Kaspar's exercise-book. Kaspar had not cried for help, but gave all his attention to finding the bag. The wound proved more serious than was apprehended, and in three days he died, at not over twenty-two years of age and only five years after his first appearance. Though many persons were again brought up as suspected, no commitment was ever made.

To tell of all the speculations regarding Kaspar's origin; of the ridiculous experiments by which it was attempted to prove his descent from a noble Hungarian family (an attempt that led to the insanity of an estimable lady); of the enormous literature invented to prove him an illegitimate descendant of this or that princely house (which eventually called forth a royal decree); of the vile intrigues for which scheming politicians used his name; of the scandalous accusations of innocent and philanthropic men and women—to tell all this swelled Von der Linde's book to two large volumes, and there it can be read in full detail. That Kaspar Hauser, whoever and whatever he was, was able to deceive the world, seems more largely a matter of accident than of designed imposture. Apparently Kaspar used the original device of the letter to gain admittance to the cavalry, his fitness for which he showed by his remarkable performances on horseback. His peculiar surroundings created a rôle for him the utter impossibility of which words cannot exaggerate or describe, but which was accepted by him and applauded by the public. Few, however, of all the competent persons who had opportunities of forming an independent judgment were really deceived. His patron, Stanhope, acknowledged his error, and the literature of 276 numbers shows many attempts to expose the real Kaspar. But when such attempts were commented upon as follows, "If we should ever hear that the author had been put in chains as a maniac, we should not be at all surprised," or "Hell itself has its abominable representatives on earth," it is not surprising that cautious men kept silent. Neither the medical science of today, nor the means of investigation and publicity afforded by the telegraph and the reporter for the daily press, existed to bring the deception to a summary conclusion.

* Kaspar once told that he had had revealed to him in a dream some peculiar Latin words, which, when written down, proved to be part of an ode of Horace, and actually got persons to believe him. He afterwards admitted the deception. Von der Linde gives a catalogue of seventy-two gross deceptions, occurring within a few months, at Daumer's house.

History of the Town of Easton, Massachusetts. By William L. Chaffin. Cambridge: University Press. 1886.

MR. CHAFFIN'S history is sure to take and hold a high rank in the class to which it belongs. Its preparation has been the work of many years, and he has done his task with loving faithfulness. His conscientiousness is evident on every page, but particularly so when he is handling critical matters on which the town has been divided in the past. If he is ever just a little wearisome, it is when he is made so by his almost morbid fear of doing injustice to either party in a quarrel. The most critical case of all is that relating to the parish division upon the lines of the Unitarian controversy in 1831. Mr. Chaffin is now and has been for many years a Unitarian minister in Easton, but the most orthodox will be unable to detect the slightest bias of his theology upon his judgment of that miserable affair. To be full and accurate and conscientious is not enough, however, to make a readable town history. Many town histories are all this and they are insufferably dull. But Mr. Chaffin's for the most part is "as interesting as a novel" of the more interesting kind. His materials were helpful to this end. He has not dressed them up. There is no attempt at vivid or dramatic writing, but his eye is quick to see the force or humor of a situation, and his style does not obscure the natural features of events. His arrangement of his materials is extremely happy, and his handsome volume of 838 pp. octavo is one which, for the writers of more general histories of New England life and manners, will be an inestimable ménoire pour servir.

The town of Easton is in the northeast corner of Bristol Co., Mass. Its principal business is that of shovel-making, carried on by the Messrs. Ames, of whom Gov. Ames is now the most conspicuous person. There are other important industries. An account of all of them is given in chapters xxx and xxxiii; an account of their weak beginnings before 1800 in chapter xvi. Although the earliest settlement was not till 1694, the interest and importance of the early history are as predominantly ecclesiastical as with the oldest Massachusetts towns. After three chapters on the topography of the town, the original purchase, and the early settlers, in the fourth chapter we come to Elder William Pratt, and, of the twenty-five chapters following, thirteen are concerned with various aspects of the religious life of Easton. The ecclesiastical history of the town has been singularly checkered. The course of true love never ran less smooth. The first minister, Elder William Pratt, whose ministry began and continued several years before the incorporation of the town, left behind him some remarkable documents from which Mr. Chaffin has liberally quoted. The elder's orthography and piety shine with emulous brightness in the closing passage of an account of his voyage to South Carolina and back, bringing with him Heber and Hager, two negro slaves valued at £50: "But god haveing a design to try & prove us furder, & to sho' his pour & faithfullness, & to mak us pris marsys the mor, cased a violent storm to wris, & driveing us from land again for about a fortnite, but on the 23rd of febuary brought us all safe to land for wch we promised to prais his holy name." Elder Pratt's account of a secret fast he kept in 1699 is extreme in its simplicity. With God's "assistants" he "hild out comfortablely until it was near Night." Here is his recipe for the treatment of a certain ailment: "When nothing Else would do to stop the excessive bleeding at the nous, the pouder of a dryed toad with beeswax hath stoped it: the toad for hast was dryed in the ouven, but it shuld be hung up by the leag, alive until it is dead and dry."

The second minister, the Rev. Matthew Short, belied his name in the length of his discourses, if the one given in the appendix, which was printed by his congregation, is a fair example; but he made it good by the brevity of his settlement, which was cut short by death in 1731. The sermon given is one of the most ponderously huge and elaborately subdivided we have ever seen; but doubtless there were many like it in its generation. The more tragic elements of the ecclesiastical history beginto appear in chapter vii, with the Rev. Joseph Belcher's dissatisfaction with his salary, his insanity, and mysterious disappearance. Hundreds of New England towns have quarrelled over the location of the meeting-house. In Cummington it was moved from place to place so often that it should have been permanently set on wheels. Easton was no exception to the rule. It had its quarrel, which was of twelve years' duration and was complicated with questions of ministerial heresy and probity. The East-enders set up a Presbyterian church. The Baptists objected to being taxed for false doctrine. The morals of the town were not improved by the spectacle of a minister threatening to break the heads of the General Court Committee, and many similar amenities. There was a "decline of Religeon and the Love of many wexes cold." So mourned the Baptists in 1789 when their society was on its last legs. It was a general complaint.

The earlier phase of the Unitarian controversy—that of theological difference—did not begin to be so productive of ill feeling and local strife as the later phase of parochial division, when the question was which of the contending parties should have the church building and the parish funds. In Easton the Unitarians were the stronger in parish voters, the weaker in churchgoers and church members. Mr. Sheldon was a rigid Calvinist, and would not exchange with the Unitarians round about. He was requested to and did not. Then trouble began, and it lasted eight years, with every imaginable variety of complication. There were committees and conferences and councils innumerable. The Unitarian majority put themselves legally in the wrong by refusing to pay Mr. Sheldon's salary, on the ground of his refusing to exchange with other Congregational ministers. There were many painful and some ludicrous situations. Mr. Sheldon assisting, the doors of the pews belonging to his friends in the old meeting-house were fastened with iron strips and bolts well riveted. The climax of absurdity was reached when the parish party, obliged to pay Mr. Sheldon's salary, required his services. As he was preaching twice a day to his seceded friends, he shortened his sermons to his enemies. But they demanded their money's worth, and they got it full measure, pressed down and running over. Nevertheless, there was a settlement at last, and Mr. Sheldon lived to be a welcome guest in homes from which he had long been excluded. He was an excellent man, yet he dearly loved a fight, and his "staying quality" in the teeth of vigorous opposition was remarkable.

But we must not give the impression that Mr. Chaffin's history is exclusively ecclesiastical. There are admirable chapters on Easton in the French and Indian and Revolutionary war; one on "Old Abandoned Homesteads," and one on the war of 1812, and among the later chapters there are full and interesting ones on libraries, public schools, "shadows" of local slavery and thievery and intemperance; there is one upon highways, and one on burial places. These last have been very numerous in Easton, and lovers of queer epitaphs would do well to consult Mr. Chaffin's pages. The chapter upon Easton in the civil war is the most elaborate in the volume. Even the deserters, of whom there were 18 out of 277 volunteers, are not passed over in silence. The record could afford these dreadful blots. Chapter xxxiv, "Easton in 1886," gives an agreeable picture of the appearance of the town. It is fortunate in having a station, a memorial hall, and a library that were designed by Richardson—the memorial hall, one of his most beautiful buildings. They were all given to the town by members of the Ames family. The Unitarian church and parsonage, hardly less beautiful, came from the same generous hands. There are charming heliotypes of these buildings and of several others—some also of wide views and some of persons; all adding much to the value of the book. There is, finally, an admirable index, and an appendix containing many valuable documentary illustrations.

Tenth Census of the United States. 1880. Vol. xviii. Social Statistics of Cities. Part I. The New England and the Middle States. Washington.

THERE is something in the very appearance of a public document that alarms the general reader. The size is portentous, the shape awkward, the binding unattractive, and the contents usually dreary to the last degree. Wise men, as a rule, cannot be induced to open these books that are no books, unless they are specialists, and specialists are generally disappointed in them. Of this volume, however, we must say that it is interesting. If its form were not so utterly impracticable, we should say that the Government might in this case have received something like an equivalent for its money; but we fear that a quarto nearly a foot square and three inches thick, whatever its contents, can never have many readers. The plan upon which the work was begun involved the writing of the history of every city treated of, from colonial times down to the present day, as a sort of introduction to its statistics—a plan on nearly the same scale as that of Diedrich Knickerbocker, who thought it necessary to start his history of New York with the creation of the world. Thus the historical sketch of Boston occupies 27 pages, that of Philadelphia 38 pages, and that of New York 28 pages, while Providence, Pittsburgh, Rome, and Syracuse get from 15 down to 6 or 7 pages. It was very soon found that at this rate there would be no statistics at all, for the appropriation would be exhausted in paying for historical essays. Accordingly the history of such towns as Hartford, New Haven, and others of equal importance is disposed of in a very summary way, Hartford and Brooklyn, for example, getting each 2 pages and New Haven only 1. So far as they go, these brief sketches seem to be very well done, and although they can hardly be looked upon as essential to the plan of the work, they of course add greatly to its interest. That of New York is by Mrs. Martha Lamb; that of Philadelphia by Susan Coolidge; most of the others are unsigned. The preparation of the report was in the charge of Col. George Waring of Newport, and, with the exception of the extravagance referred to, it is a truly scientific production. Even this extravagance must be judged leniently; for the valuable labors of our historians are generally so ill paid that hardly any one could grudge them this amount of patronage from the Government. In view of the profuse and reckless waste of the earnings of our people of which their representatives are guilty, it is consoling to discover an accidental diversion of a few crumbs to the encouragement of such patriotic labors as these. We should look with apprehension upon any attempt on the part of Congress to patronize literature; but when the disbursement of an appropriation happens to fall into such hands as those of Col. Waring, we can rejoice at the practical results without defending the theory.

The general plan followed in the arrangement of these statistics may be illustrated in the case of the city of Boston. There is given in the first place a small map showing by diverging lines the directions and distances of the principal cities of Massachusetts and the neighboring States, which is flanked by tables of population and followed by a statement of the financial condition of the city. Interspersed through the account are larger maps, exhibiting the original topography and early settlement, together with the present shore-line; the appearance of the city in 1772; the same in 1800; the same in 1814; the areas and dates of annexation of territory down to 1880; the location of the steam railroads and stations in that year; the ground occupied by buildings in that year; the horse railroads; the location of the concert and beer gardens, theatres, halls and lecture rooms, and museums; the hotels, apartment hotels, libraries, school-houses, and churches; the police districts; the societies, secret and benefit, hospitals, asylums, and homes—all clearly printed, but failing to show the streets of 1880 with the old maps in relief, as contemplated by the editor.

The text treats with the detail of an encyclopædia of almost every conceivable element of municipal existence. We have an account of the site and elevation of the city, of the railroads, the tributary country, the topography and the climate. The streets, the parks, the theatres, the churches, the cemeteries, all receive due notice. Then follow accounts of the municipal government in all its branches, finance, police, health, etc; especially interesting accounts of the system of sewers, the schools and libraries, hospitals, dispensaries, and penal institutions; and an essay upon the commerce of the port and the principal industries that centre in Boston. Dry as the list may sound, the particulars are so well arranged and judiciously presented that they are in the main extremely readable. The whole account has a unity that shows a trained sense of proportion in the compiler, and at the same time impresses the reader with a most profound sense of the enormous complexity of municipal existence.

There is perhaps in all this material nothing more striking than what is commonly supposed to be the proper subject-matter of a census—the statistics of population. By the year 1840 the influence of immigration had begun to be felt in Boston. In 1845, out of a population of 114,000, more than 32 per cent. were of foreign birth. This element increased in 1850 to more than 45 per cent., of whom five-sixths were of Irish parentage. From 1850 to 1855 the native population increased by 600, the foreign by 22,000; and in the latter year the balance had turned. In 1820 the foreign-born element had been so small as to be inappreciable; within the period of a generation it increased so as to constitute a majority of the population. Although it is in the nature of the case impossible that this proportion should be maintained, yet in 1875, out of a population of 342,000, 117,000 were foreign-born. In that year to every 100 births of American parentage there were 57 births of mixed and 189 of foreign parentage. In 1878 there were 10,160 births in Boston; of these only 2,874 were of American parents. The descendants of the generation that inhabited Boston in 1820 had become nearly as insignificant in numbers as the foreigners of that day, and their relative strength necessarily diminishes in an increasing ratio. In 1870 it appeared that of the inhabitants of Boston, 150,000 had foreign fathers, the same number foreign mothers, and 142,000 persons had both foreign fathers and foreign mothers.

In view of these facts, it seems remarkable, not that Boston should now have an Irish Catholic for Mayor, but that it did not long since have one. We are almost tempted to believe that a municipality is indeed a vital organism, since it can not only exist but continue its development in spite of such a sudden and complete change in the nature of its population. The moulding power of institutions was never more strikingly manifested; for, in spite of the semi-barbarous condition of the Celtic immigrants, the city seems to be in a sound condition, and the descendants of the original settlers may still look upon it with pride.

Dorothy Wordsworth: The Story of a Sister's Love. By Edmund Lee. Dodd, Mead & Co. 1887.

THE materials for this biography were slight, and consisted of passages already published in other volumes; but something is gained by collecting these and grouping them about one central person. It is very difficult, however, to make the sister of Wordsworth the main subject when he is himself continually in the story; and consequently this volume is rather a fireside view of the poet, a history of his domestic life, than a mere biography of one member of his family. But of Wordsworth's home Dorothy was a large part; through her came at first that womanly influence and sympathetic fostering of his genius, to which, as his poems frequently attest, he felt he owed so much of the felicity of his lot. She was devoted to him in his early years, kept house for him until his marriage, and afterwards continued to reside with him. She entertained his friends, and was prized by all of them. Mrs. Coleridge, in fact, is charged with some feelings of jealousy, and is said not to have relished the freedom with which Miss Dorothy, after returning from a walk with Wordsworth and Coleridge in which a shower overtook them, would go, without permission asked, to the wardrobe and array herself in her friend's gowns. Miss Dorothy was a pedestrian who could not be tired, and, intellectually, too, she could keep the pace. De Quincey gives the most life-like description of her:

"Her face was of Egyptian brown; rarely in a woman of English birth had I seen a more determinate Gypsy tan. Her eyes were not soft, as Mrs. Wordsworth's, nor were they fierce or bold; but they were wild and startling, and hurried in their motion. Her manner was warm, and even ardent; her sensibility seemed constitutionally deep, and some subtle fire of impassioned intellect apparently burned within her, which, being alternately pushed forward into a conspicuous expression, by the irrepressible instincts of her temperament, and then immediately checked, in obedience to the decorum of her sex and age and her maidenly condition, gave to her whole demeanor and to her conversation an air of embarrassment, and even of self-conflict, that was almost distressing to witness. . . . She was a person of remarkable endowments, intellectually; and in addition to the other great services which she rendered to her brother, this I may mention as greater than all the rest, and it was one which equally operated to the benefit of every casual companion in a walk—viz., the exceeding sympathy, always ready and always profound, by which she made all that one would tell her, all that one would describe, all that one could quote from a foreign author, reverberate, as it were, à plusieurs reprises, to one's own feelings by the manifest impression it made upon hers."

Of the person and the temperament so well sketched in these lines, this little volume gives as much illustration as could be drawn from the poems, letters, and records of daily life, impressions of visitors, etc., which are to be found in the various Wordsworth memorials; and the book belongs in the library of female biography. The diary of the tour in Scotland, which Prof. Shairp published a few years ago, and some few undistinguished poems, comprise all of the literary work from her hand, unless a few letters to friends are to be included; but it is natural, and it is most fitting, that she should be seen rather in the light which Wordsworth's gratitude and affection cast about her than by her own originality, for if she had any originality, she allowed her brother to absorb it. They were united in unusually close bonds of a common nature, of which his poems were the expression; and in them the softer and feminine element may be regarded as, in a sense, her part. The whole volume breathes the peace, quiet pleasures, and domesticity of Wordsworth's home; and the closing chapters, which contain in few words the story of how his sister's mind became weakened and dull in consequence of a severe illness, and how the care of her was one of the poet's most cherished occupations in his last aged years, are full of pathos. She died in her eighty-third year.

Representative English Prose and Prose Writers. By Theodore W. Hunt, Ph.D. A. C Armstrong & Son. 1887.

THIS is a book excellently adapted to convey practical instruction in the principles and history of English prose composition. The rise and development of the art are briefly outlined, and its stages characterized with understanding and care; then the analytical method is adopted, and the different kinds of prose are defined and described; lastly, the author uses the illustrative mode of exposition, and examines separately and in detail the merits and defects, as prose writers merely, of twelve representative men, i. e., Bacon, Hooker, Milton, Swift, Addison, Johnson, Burke, Lamb, Macaulay, DeQuincey, Dickens, and Carlyle. This last division occupies two-thirds of the volume and is the real matter of it, the earlier parts being of a prefatory nature. In the special criticism of one or two of these authors one could find points upon which to enter protest, but they would be few. The work as a whole is exceedingly well done, and shows thorough study, sound judgment, and a true sense of literary virtues and faults under all their outward changes. The standards of the writer are firmly fixed, and he refers to them with confidence; and it is the confidence born of knowledge. The volume has the great merit of making an instructive study of some of the masters of English serve as an exercise both in style and in criticism. It would be particularly available as an advanced text-book in rhetoric.

Tables for the Determination of Common Minerals. By W. O. Crosby. Boston: Mass. Institute of Technology. 1887.

THE use of systematic tables in determinative mineralogy, is, as Mr. Crosby in his preface very truly says, rather restricted than increased by attempting to embrace all known species, the fact being that beyond the two or three hundred common minerals, the thousand or more rare species are not likely to be often met with by the student or young mineralogist for whom such tables are primarily designed. The professional mineralogist, on the other hand, will have all the facts contained in such tables so completely at his fingers' ends that he will not be likely to make use of such adventitous aids. In preparing his tables, therefore, Mr. Crosby has confined himself to the two hundred most common mineral species, and has restricted the determinative tests mainly to their physical properties, which can be recognized without the complicated apparatus of a laboratory. It is primarily upon their chemical properties that the many sets of tables hitherto published (all founded more or less upon those of Von Cobell) are based, and their use requires at least a blowpipe apparatus, which is not conveniently carried with one in the field. In this respect Mr. Crosby's tables undoubtedly supply a want; but for actual field use they would have been still more convenient had they been published of such size that they could be easily carried in the pocket.

A Look Round Literature.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

12mo, cloth, $2.25.

"He surveys the literary field from Æschylus to Tennyson. Mr. Buchanan's pronouncements are, as might be expected, an agreeable mélange of praise and blame. His attitude is that of autocrat-nism to what he deems the 'authorized' criticism of the day. It is gratifying to meet with the critical work of a man at once so enthusiastic and so independent. It would, indeed, have been a pity had Mr. Buchanan not given a permanent form to essays so thoughtful and so stimulating."—London Globe.

SCRIBNER & WELFORD, 743-745 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Scribner's Magazine

FOR APRIL. VOL. I, NO. 4.

THE April Number contains the first instalment of the long expected COLLECTION OF UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF THACKERAY, illustrated by facsimile reproductions of characteristic drawings by the novelist. This remarkable and unique series of letters, revealing as they do for the first time the personality of Thackeray, will more than fulfil the expectations aroused by their announcement. The letters are preceded by a brief introduction by Mrs. Jane Octavia Brookfield, to whom most of them were addressed, and by whose authority they are now given to the public. It is not possible to exaggerate their importance. There is in them not only Thackeray's delightful humor and inimitable charm of style, but also the great personal interest which attaches only to autobiographical writings.

EXTRACT FROM THE INTRODUCTION.

"No writer of recent times is so much quoted as Thackeray; scarcely a week passes without his name occurring in one or other of the leading articles of the day. And yet whilst his published works retain their influence so firmly, the personal impression of his life and conversation becomes more and more shadowy and indistinct as the friends who knew and loved him the most are gradually becoming fewer and passing away. . . . The letters which form this collection were, most of them, written by Mr. Thackeray to my husband, the late Rev. W. H. Brookfield, and myself, from about 1847, and continuing during many years of intimate friendship, beginning from the time when he first lived in London, and when he especially needed our sympathy."

"The Great Abyssinian Banana."

Mr. William Robinson, the great English authority on gardening, says this is the noblest decorative plant in the world, and the many customers we induced to try it last season confirm this.

Mr. Krieger, Superintendent of Wheeling Park, writes: "I never had anything in the park that has attracted one-quarter the attention and admiration as these wonderful Bananas. You will remember my buying fifty of them when at your establishment last spring, at your earnest recommendation, though I confess I was decidedly skeptical of such small plants realizing your glowing description. I planted them in an old dahlia bed, and, although the soil was very rich already, I piled on the manure 'thick and heavy,' and spaded it in. Then I had my men water the bed daily with the hose. The result is astonishing. To-day (October 14) the plants are 15 feet high (actual measurement), and their beauty and majestic appearance are beyond my powers of description." A member of the Pittsburgh Club, who bought a lot to plant in front of the club house (in the central part of the city) says: "The rapidity of their growth astonished me, and I have been bothered not a little trying to tell the many inquirers what they are. They are cheap, ridiculously cheap, for I could not have equalled their tropical effectiveness with a couple hundred dollars' worth of palms."

The great merits of this banana have long been known to plantsmen and amateurs, but its high price has always prevented its becoming popular. We have succeeded in getting a large stock, which we can offer at about one-sixth the usual prices.

In the latitude of New York they should not be planted until the 20th or 25th of May. In some of the Southern States and California they are entirely hardy.

PRICES: 50 cts., 75 cts., $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, and $3.00 each; $5.00, $8.00, $10.00, $15.00, $20.00, and $30.00 per dozen, according to size; a few extra large plants at $5.00 and $10.00 each. The smallest sized plants will make fine specimens (from 6 to 12 feet high) the first season if soil is very rich and freely watered. We will send the smallest size, postpaid, by mail, carefully packed, for 75 cts. each. The large sizes are not mailable.

OUR BOOK.—Our work, 'A Few Flowers Worthy of General Culture,' was published (at first for free distribution) to call serious attention to the great advantage of gardening with hardy flowers; but its attractiveness created such a great demand for it, and from many who were not plant buyers, that it was a serious tax on us, and we are compelled to make a nominal charge for it. The fourth and enlarged edition, now ready, is certainly the most beautiful and original book on flowers yet published. Can be had bound in handsome durable cover for 50 cents, or in leather for 75 cents, and FIFTY CENTS will be ALLOWED ON THE FIRST ORDER SENT amounting to two dollars or more; or an order for two dollars or more will secure a copy free, but not a second copy if one has already been received.

OUR DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, containing a complete list of the best new and old varieties of Roses, Clematises, Rhododendrons, Hardy Azaleas, Carnations, Lilies, Tuberous-rooted Begonias, Gloxinias, and the largest collection of Hardy Plants in America, sent on receipt of ten cents in stamps.

"This deeply interesting work. . . . Much praise is due to the author of this work for the intelligence with which she has collected in a limited space all the principal facts of these 'Two Royal Lives.' By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

12mo, cloth, $2.25.

"He surveys the literary field from Æschylus to Tennyson. Mr. Buchanan's pronouncements are, as might be expected, an agreeable melange of praise and blame. His attitude is that of antagonism to what he deems the 'authorized' criticism of the day. It is gratifying to meet with the critical work of a man at once so enthusiastic and so independent. It would, indeed, have been a pity had Mr. Buchanan not given a permanent form to essays so thoughtful and so stimulating."—London Globe.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1887.

The Week.

THE Republican majority in the Assembly did their party as well as the people of this city a great service on Wednesday week. They both passed the Crosby High License Bill, and adopted several amendments, all of which were improvements, and one of which has greatly strengthened the original measure. As the bill stands now, it not only requires all saloons selling strong liquors to pay an annual license tax of $1,000, but it makes it comparatively easy for the authorities to detect and punish holders of wine and beer licenses who attempt to sell strong liquors on the sly. Under the amended bill any person having a wine and beer license, or storekeeper's beer license, for each of which the tax is $100, who shall keep on hand on the premises any intoxicating liquors other than those permitted in his license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and his license shall be forfeited. This disposes of the main objection which has been made to the Crosby bill, namely, that with a liquor license at $1,000, and wine and beer license at $100, holders of the latter would sell strong liquors illicitly, and it would be impossible to detect them. Now it will only be necessary to find the liquors on their premises in order to take away their licenses. Under the present laws it is necessary to prove that they not only have the liquors but have sold them. As amended, the bill is applicable to all cities of 400,000 and more inhabitants, which limits it to New York and Brooklyn.

We do not see how the Prohibitionists are going to continue their warfare against the amended bill, since the additional provision in regard to illicit selling takes away their strongest ground of objection. They can only point to the wide difference between the liquor license fee and that for beer and wine license, but they should remember that, out of about 9,000 licensed saloons in this city, nearly 8,000 have full liquor licenses, and it is upon them that the restraint is needed. We are very glad that all efforts to reduce the $1,000 fee have failed thus far, for statistics all show that any fee less than that is not sufficiently restraining. In the following thirteen cities it will be seen that the number of saloons to population rises pretty steadily in proportion as the license rate goes down:

City.	Saloons.	License.	Saloons to population.
Omaha	176	$1,000	1 to 426
Kansas City	405	845	1 to 309
St. Louis	1,600	550	1 to 312
Chicago	3,760	500	1 to 213
Detroit	1,023	300	1 to 130
Cleveland	1,540	200	1 to 129
Indianapolis	348	200	1 to 288
St. Paul	600	100	1 to 221
San Francisco	2,799	84	1 to 84
Brooklyn	3,000	76	1 to 216
New York	9,197	75	1 to 138
Philadelphia	5,959	50	1 to 142
Baltimore	2,655	50	1 to 115

The obvious fact disclosed is that any fee under $500 is too small to have much restraining influence, and that the moment it rises above that sum the number of saloons begins to fall off.

The tribute which the Pennsylvania Republicans pay to Mr. Randall as a party ally by laying out a Democratic district for him in Philadelphia, would be less marked if this apportionment was merely a natural and just one, made by an equitable division of the territory according to population. But when it is found that in order to keep Mr. Randall, the Democrat, in the House of Representatives, the partisan Republicans at Harrisburg who make the apportionment have gone out of their way to patch him up a district that will give him a Democratic majority, then the value of Mr. Randall as a Republican ally becomes all the more apparent. The arrangement of districts reported by the Committee last week divides those of Philadelphia, according to population and latest vote, as follows:

	Population.	Maj.
First District	166,908	5,024 R.

Thus, in order to make a Democratic majority for Mr. Randall, the Republican legislators have to construct a district which contains nearly 40,000 less population than the average population of the other Philadelphia districts, and 83,500 less than the most populous of these. The Democratic majority in the next House of Representatives will be much more stupid than the average majorities at Washington if, in the face of all the evidence of the value of Mr. Randall to the Republicans, they once more permit him, in terror of the cry of "free trade," to be elevated to a place in which he will have the greatest opportunity to pay his debt to his political opponents.

Mr. Sherman's speech at Nashville is an impressive proof of the decadence of the Republican party. The most striking thing in the development of public opinion in this country since the last Presidential election is the hearty response, not merely of his own party, but of all candid members of the Opposition, to Mr. Cleveland's firm stand against the theory that "the Government should support the people," which is at the bottom of the great river-and-harbor log-rolling bills, the Blair educational schemes, and the high protective duties. The country is evidently with Mr. Cleveland in the firm stand which he has taken against paternalism in government; and the party which presents in 1888 the candidate who best embodies this sentiment, will secure the votes that will decide the election. Yet, with all this as plain as the nose on a man's face, the Republican leader who has been accounted the most promising, deliberately commits his party in all the above particulars to a policy which a nation rejects. This indicates, if it does not prove, that the possibility of again bringing the Republican party abreast with the times is past.

Senator Sherman unconsciously paid a notable tribute to the Democratic Administration in his speech at Nashville. Referring to the denial in times past of equal rights to Southern negroes at the polls, he said: "I was glad to hear, in passing through several of the Southern States, conservative citizens say that public sentiment now revolts at the unlawful methods to defeat the free exercise of equal rights of citizens that have been adopted in several States, and are still practised in what are known as the black counties of the South." This agrees with the observation of Gen. Armstrong of the Hampton (Va.) Institute, who recently made a tour through the South, and who testifies that "a better feeling between the races is setting in" since Mr. Cleveland's inauguration. Such admissions by men like Senator Sherman and Gen. Armstrong, that a Democratic Administration has done more than the Republicans ever were able to do to establish just relations between the whites and the blacks at the South, effectually dispose of the plea that the Republican party ought to be restored to power in the interest of the colored race.

Not a day now passes that fails to bring out some new Republican paper of good standing in its State against the renomination of Mr. Blaine by the party next year, and this continues to be particularly true of the West, where the Blaine craze used to be so strong. In Iowa the protest of the Hawkeye in Burlington is promptly re-echoed by the Nonpareil in Council Bluffs, which "submits to its readers the query whether Mr. Blaine was not in 1884, like Mr. Clay in 1844, at the height of his strength," and follows it up with these other queries: "Is it possible to increase or even maintain the enthusiasm of his admirers of two years ago? Is it possible to bring him any new elements of support? Is there any quarter in which he is more popular now than in 1884? Is the confidence which he inspires in other public men and party leaders greater? And, finally and most decisively, could he carry now, any better than in 1884, the State of Indiana, the State of New York, or the State of Connecticut?" Evidently taking it for granted that its readers will answer all of these queries in the negative, the Nonpareil ridicules the suggestion of trusting to the chapter of accidents and "clutching at straws of chances in this or that Southern State—the Virginias, or North Carolina, or Tennessee—in order to compensate for risks unnecessarily taken in the North," and advises the choice of a leader "on whom there would be no chance of a division."

While the Republican press is thus confessing the folly and fatality of renominating in 1888 the Republican candidate of 1884, the tone of the Democratic press makes it daily more certain that Mr. Cleveland will be renominated by the Democrats without any serious opposition. The Savannah News and the Atlanta Constitution are certainly as well entitled to speak for the Democrats of Georgia as any two papers in the State. The News declares that "there is no doubt but that the Democratic party will desire President Cleveland to run again," and that "in consequence it might as well be understood that he will be renominated." Referring to what it calls the "amusing theory" that Mr. Cleveland is very unpopular with his party, and that his firmness and consistency in carrying out his own convictions, and what he conceives to be the policy of the party, have created dissensions which cannot be healed, the Constitution declares that "the President is responsible for a wise and conservative policy that has commended itself to the better sense of the people of the country"; that "he is stronger with the great mass of Democratic voters to-day than he was when he delivered his inaugural address"; that "he has inaugurated and carried out an administrative policy that will add thousands of votes to the Democratic party in the next election"; and that "the Republicans will discover in due time that the Democratic party is for Cleveland." Such language from representative Democratic newspapers shows that the St. Louis Globe-Democrat was quite right when it notified the Republicans who are counting on the alleged Democratic hostility to Mr. Cleveland, that papers like the New York World and Sun and Louisville Courier-Journal "voice the views of a mere handful of malcontents, whose wishes would not have the slightest influence in directing the party choice, and whose opposition would not be a featherweight in a canvass against the party candidate."

The President has made a very good selection for the Turkish mission in the person of Mr. Oscar S. Straus of this city, a Jewish lawyer of excellent standing, and an active Mugwump and reformer. The Turkish mission is not, it must be admitted, a post of great responsibility, as we have but little trade with Turkey and no interest in the Eastern question, and could not, in case of a war, threaten her with any loss or damage that she would care about. But we have missionaries there who are doing admirable work, and who sorely need support and protection, as some of them have before now been murdered with perfect impunity. Moreover, though Turkey is a rapidly decaying State, new nations are springing from her soil, which are probably destined to make a great figure in European history during the coming century. At such a crisis, it is most desirable that the United States should be represented there, as it was in Gen. Wallace's day, by somebody who, in intelligence as well as character, will do credit to the American name, and maintain American influence. The notion that it makes any difference to the Sultan or the Turks whether a foreign minister is a Jew or a Christian, is ridiculous. To a good Mussulman they are both substantially the same thing—that is, people who, as the midshipman said of the Fiji Islanders, have no manners and whose customs are disgusting.

The difficulties of the old-fashioned Blaine papers about the Inter-State Commerce Commission are so great that one cannot help feeling sorry for any Blaine editor who finds them insuperable, and lets the whole subject alone. Our wretched contemporary, the Boston Journal, seems to be in more trouble from this cause than any of its companions. For two days after the names of the Commissioners were announced it remained perfectly silent about them, probably because the editor was either looking for advice or was sitting at home in dumb despair, surrounded by his family. Apparently, either nobody advised him to face his trouble like a man and say that Cleveland had done a good thing, or, if anybody did give him this advice, he disregarded it. What he seems to have resolved on was to seek, not work or strife, in which so many people find a cure for sorrow, but mild distraction. He has, in other words, turned to Nature as the best relief from Cleveland. So on the third day, instead of writing an article on Inter-State Commerce Commissioners, he wrote one on "Orchids." We have it before us, and we like it much. It does him credit to produce such a work under such circumstances. "Breathing the fervor of the tropics," says he, "expressing the strange luxuriance of vegetation which comes with the glare of sunlight, moisture, and rapid decay, orchids come forth on exhibition in the midst of the pale New England spring to cause wonder and bewildered curiosity. They are queer flowers, both botanically and æsthetically." He then prefaces a stirring account of the difficulty of keeping up our supply of orchids by saying: "No other flower represents such devotion of horticulturists and such perseverance under dangers by collectors." If an entire stranger may be permitted to intrude on a scene of woe with a sympathetic and respectful suggestion, we would urge the mingling of music with flowers as an object of study until the present cloud passes from the journalistic sky. The ordeal, we are sure, will not last long. Time, the great healer, works wonders in these cases. It will not be many weeks before our stricken contemporary will be able to speak of the Commission without betraying any emotion, or even to return to his old pastime of lying about the Administration.

The Times calls attention to a very gross misstatement and perversion contained in the Messrs. Appleton's 'Cyclopædia of American Biography,' which seems to show that the firm will have to look after their editors a little more carefully. A cyclopædia of biography, being intended to be a permanent and accurate book of reference, should, in dealing with contemporary politics and politicians, be absolutely colorless, and above all things should avoid producing party surmises or excuses as historical facts. The 'Cyclopædia,' however, in the sketch of Dr. Burchard of this city, is made to ascribe the loss of the State by Blaine, as a positive fact, to Dr. Burchard's remark about "rum, Romanism, and rebellion." The "official count," says the writer with extraordinary assurance, "gave the State and the Presidency to the Democrats by only 1,047, and the number changed by Dr. Burchard's remarks was reasonably estimated at several thousand." The loose, slip-shod character of this last assertion hardly calls for comment. How "reasonably"? And by whom "estimated"? By what process was the number "several thousands" reached? It is very discreditable that such things should appear in a book which anybody is expected to put on his shelves as a reservoir of facts. The truth is, that not one man has ever appeared, or been produced, or designated by name or description, who admitted that he had, or was known to have, changed his vote by reason of Dr. Burchard's remark. That his remark had any influence whatever on the vote was a mere guess or suggestion of some of Mr. Blaine's managers in the first moments of chagrin over the miscarriage of the arrangements they had made for the capture of the Irish Catholic vote. A large portion of it they undoubtedly did secure, which accounts for the closeness with which Blaine followed Cleveland in this State, but they did not get all they expected, and had bargained for, owing to "Johnny" O'Brien's treachery, and thus lost their money and the election. We are here stating things which it would be difficult to get an intelligent man in this city to deny, and for which a large amount of evidence might be produced, and yet we should never think of admitting them into a book of reference as historical truth. The Burchard theory of Blaine's defeat was put afloat, not because it had any foundation whatever, but because it was the only one available which was not damaging to Blaine personally, and which relieved the managers in this city from responsibility.

The Reform League of Baltimore, an organization of men of both parties who have been zealously working to secure honest elections, has won a notable victory. There has been for some time a registration law upon the statute-book, but registers who were disposed to falsify the books have been in the habit of striking off the names of qualified voters and adding bogus names by wholesale, in the belief that but a tithe of these frauds could be rectified before election, and that the courts could not review their work after election. But a unanimous decision has just been rendered by the Court of Appeals which establishes the fact that the registration law was made for a practical purpose, and that registers cannot defeat its operations by piling up cases and throwing obstacles in the way of the courts until after election. This is a great point gained, and will encourage the League to continue its efforts, and bring to as speedy trial as possible the thousand cases which now crowd the dockets of the courts, with the result of administering an effective check to the system of frauds in elections.

The "gentleman in politics" has frequently been a very odd, sometimes a very odious, figure during the past few years, so apt has he been to try to outdo the "practical men" in practicalness and the tricky politicians in trickery. We do not recall, however, at this moment a more grotesque example of his folly and his futility than Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge has been presenting re cently in Rhode Island. He actually left his own State in order to defend on the stump the sale of the Governorship to a rich New Yorker, by a ring of politicians headed by Brayton, who while in the public service stole $30,000 of the Government's money. The American stump has seen many strange things, but nothing stranger than a man of fortune and a scholar, a Harvard graduate and quondam instructor, and an author of some repute, perorating publicly against the people who object to this degrading spectacle as guilty of a "mixture of sham morals and false issues which is revolting to any honest-minded man." The trouble with Mr. Lodge and his congeners is that they forget, before they have got very far on their road, how "honest minds" feel about any question of public morals or policy. In fact, they could not succeed in their new calling if they kept alive the memories of their better hours. So that Mr. Lodge's talk about what "revolts honest minds" in politics is about as valuable as his description of the Gardens of the Hesperides would be—that is, it is pure romance.

The Tennessee Senate, by a close vote, rejected the House bill increasing the school fund from $2,000,000 to $5,000,000, and thus more than doubling the annual income available for educational purposes, but it substituted a measure, which has since been accepted by the House, that will produce the same desirable result. The proportion of the general State tax devoted to the schools has been increased from 10 to 15 cents on every $100 of property, and 10 cents of what is called the privilege tax is applied to the same purpose, thus raising the total school fund from 10 to 25 cents per $100, or more than doubling it—besides which both branches have agreed in doubling the former appropriation for the normal school. This increase of the State school fund of itself assures a decided improvement in the system, and if supplemented by the local taxes which the counties are able to levy, and which some of them are already levying, the Memphis Appeal says that "the schools of the State may be kept open for nine months in the year." As the Appeal further says, "this would afford abundant opportunity for the children, black as well as white, to get an education and as fair a start in life as is vouchsafed now in the States most favored in this regard." Best promise of all for Tennessee's future, this remarkable development of her public-school system, established only about fifteen years ago, is the work of her own people, without any help from a paternal government.

The revival of Knownothingism in California is a curious political phenomenon. At the State election last fall one Wigginton announced himself the candidate, for Governor, of the American party, and, although his performance was much ridiculed, he received 7,260 votes, or four out of every hundred that were cast. The recent municipal election in Oakland, the second city in the State, indicates that the new party possesses unexpected vitality. A full American ticket was put in the field, and although none of its nominees were elected except one who was also on the Republican ticket, its candidate for Mayor received 1,357 votes to 2,009 for the Democratic and 2,761 for the Republican. The remarkable feature of this result is the fact that the third party appears to have drawn more heavily from the Democrats than from the Republicans, and the San Francisco Bulletin is inclined to the conclusion that Wigginton's candidacy last fall hurt the Democrats throughout the State more than it did the Republicans. The interesting question now is whether this new Knownothing movement has vitality enough to last through 1888. The original Knownothing party swept California in 1855, when it carried the Governorship by 5,000 majority over the Democratic candidate, but at the next gubernatorial election, in 1857, it polled only about 19,000 out of 93,000 votes, and was never more heard of.

Mayor Hewitt is quite right when he says of the primitive methods pursued in this city in the collecting of ashes and garbage: "There is no other city in the world which presents such a spectacle as is to be found every day in the main thoroughfares of this city, encumbered as they are by ash barrels, vessels containing garbage, and obstructions of almost every kind to the free use of the streets." If the ashes and garbage only stood on the sidewalks, it would be bad enough, but the nuisance goes far beyond that. The favorite time of collecting them on Fifth Avenue and others of our principal thoroughfares appears to be between eight and ten in the morning, when the streets are most desired by pedestrians. The barrels are then lifted to the sides of the carts, and, if there is a wind, the larger part of the contents is distributed over two or three blocks and into the eyes and upon the clothing of all the passers-by. Fifth Avenue is literally almost intolerable in the morning hours because of this practice. Not only is such a spectacle unknown in any other city of the world, but in no other city would it be tolerated for a single day.

Some of Cardinal Gibbons's additions to his report on the Knights of Labor are lamentable departures from the truthfulness and accuracy which should characterize the statements of a Christian minister. In fact, portions of the report read like a letter on "Labor" from Gen. Butler to the New York Sun. For instance, he says, touching strikes:

> "First, strikes are not the invention of the Knights, but a universal, perpetual means by which workmen protest against what is unjust and demand their rights; second, in such a struggle of the multitudes of the poor against hard, obstinate monopoly, wrath and violence are often as inevitable as they are regrettable; third, the laws and the principal authorities of the Knights, so far from encouraging violence or occasions for violence, exercise a powerful preventive influence, seeking to keep strikes within the limits of legitimate action. An attentive examination into the violent struggles between labor and capital has convinced me of the injustice of attributing violence to the Knights. Their principal authorities have proved the fact that it is as unreasonable to attribute violence to the Knights as to attribute to the Church follies and crimes of her children against which she protests."

Now, it is not true that strikes are always, or even in most cases, the "struggle of the poor against hard, obstinate monopoly." The very use of the term "monopoly" here is misleading, and, coming from a man of education, must be set down as used with intent to deceive. Nor is it true that "the principal authorities of the Knights" discourage violence or seek to prevent it. On the contrary, every species of evidence bearing on the subject shows that they have at every period of their existence either set it on foot, instigated it, encouraged it, connived at it, or apologized for it. Either the Cardinal has not made an "attentive examination" of this evidence, or his mental training has been such that no examination of evidence does him any good. The assertion that "their principal authorities have proved the fact," etc., is one which we confess we do not understand. To all outward appearance, it is untrue, but it may be true. Who the "principal authorities" are, when or where they proved "the fact," or who was the unreasonable person who said that the Church was guilty of "the crimes and follies of her children," we do not know. It would seem, however, as if people engaged in crime and folly were an odd sort of "children" for any church to have.

The Irish Coercion Bill is, we believe, the eighty-ninth bill of the kind presented to Parliament within the present century. Some of them have been worse than this one, but its greatest peculiarity, as Mr. Gladstone has pointed out, lies in the fact that it is the first coercion bill introduced in defiance of the protests of the majority of the Irish members, and the first which attempts to deal with discontent which the majority of the House acknowledges to be real, and curable by other kinds of legislation. Moreover, it is the first bill of the kind introduced in the teeth of strong English and Scotch disapproval, and the first which proposed to make permanent serious encroachments on constitutional liberty, such as subjecting public speakers and newspaper editors to the arbitary jurisdiction of justices of the peace, and providing for the transportation to England for trial, by what would be to all intents and purposes foreign juries, of persons indicted under it for certain offences. It will be remembered that this device was resorted to for a similar purpose in this country before the Revolution. To give such a bill, produced under such circumstances, a decent appearance, would have required extraordinary talent and Parliamentary experience on the Ministerial side. Its introduction by Mr. Balfour, a clever young dinner-table states man, with a lady-like voice, languishing manner, and small experience, with no better support than Mr. W. H. Smith the newsdealer could give him, was, of course, a tremendous undertaking. The sympathy freely shown for Dillon by the Gladstoneites during his impassioned harangue, and the open declaration of Hartington and Chamberlain for the policy of force, seem to promise a crisis in English politics of extraordinary violence.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, March 23, to TUESDAY, March 29, 1887 inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE President has appointed Mr. Oscar S. Straus of this city to be Minister to Turkey in place of Mr. S. S. Cox, resigned. Mr. Straus, who is thirty-six years old, was graduated from the Academic Department and the Law School of Columbia College. After a period of ill health at the practice of the law, he began a successful mercantile career. He is the author of a volume on 'The Origin of a Republican Form of Government in the United States.' He was recommended for appointment by Mr. W. R. Grace, the late Henry Ward Beecher, and other prominent citizens of this State.

The appropriation of $149,749 to indemnify Chinese subjects for the murder of their kinsmen at Rock Springs, Wyoming Territory, has been placed to the credit of the disbursing officer of the Department of State for payment to the Chinese Minister at Washington.

Lieut. Zalinski made successful experiments on March 26 at Fort Lafayette with his pneumatic dynamite gun. It is a slender steel tube sixty feet long and one foot in diameter, balanced on a skeleton framework. Four shots were fired, each shell containing fifty pounds of dynamite. The air pressure was a thousand pounds. The first shot took 9 3-5 seconds to travel 1,816 yards, and on touching the water it exploded. The second shot, with a slow fuse, struck the water 2,500 feet away, ricochetted, and disappeared. A second later a huge column of mud and water arose for many feet. In another shot the cartridge was twenty-five seconds in the air, and it struck 3,868 yards away, or about two miles and a quarter.

Senator Sherman addressed a large audience at Nashville, Tenn., March 24, on national politics. He spoke chiefly in praise of the protective tariff. He found fault with the Democratic party for having made no disposition of the surplus revenue.

At a meeting on March 24 of the Democratic State Committee of Virginia, it was decided to call a State Convention to adopt a platform for this year's campaign. The Legislature which will be elected will choose a United States Senator to succeed Mr. Riddleberger.

The New York Railroad Commissioners have made an official study of the problem of heating passenger cars safely, and reported to the Legislature that no stove or heater is safe, and that it is practicable to heat a train of the usual length with steam or hot air from the engine or from a car constructed for this purpose.

A high-license bill was passed by the Assembly of New York, March 23, which, if it become a law, will fix the fee for a license to sell spirituous liquors in New York and Brooklyn to be drunk on the premises at $1,000, and a license to sell malt liquors at $100. All the Republican members of the Assembly voted for it but four, and all the Democratic members but one voted against it. Since the bill has become a "party issue," it is considered certain to pass the Senate.

The Governor of New York has signed the Murphy "Tenement Commission" Bill, which provides for a better system of inspection and better construction and care of tenements. Not more than 65 per cent. of any lot shall be covered by buildings, and no tenement in which two families live on one floor must have dark rooms.

The Governor of New York has signed the Tilden Trust Incorporation Act, and the executors under Mr. Tilden's will can organize, and they now have power to carry out the provisions of the will to build and maintain the Tilden Free Library in this city. One amendment, however, that was proposed by the Tilden heirs was incorporated in the bill, which provides that nothing in the act shall be construed to affect the rights of the heirs in any legal proceedings instituted to test the validity of the will. The litigation that is likely to follow will probably not come to an end except by a decision of the Court of Appeals.

The collection of pictures made by the late A. T. Stewart of this city has been sold at auction. Some of the most noteworthy, with the prices they brought, are: Auguste Bonheur's "Fontainebleau," $17,800; Fortuny's "Serpent Charmer," $13,100; Gérôme's "Pollice Verso," $11,000; Meissonier's "At the Barracks," $16,000; Erskine Nicol's "The Disputed Boundary," $15,250; Meissonier's celebrated "Friedland, 1807," $66,000; Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair," $53,000; Knaus's "Children's Party," $21,300; Troyon's "Landscape and Cattle," $11,000. The total proceeds of the sale were $513,750.

It has become known that the purchaser of "The Horse Fair" was Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt. He has presented the picture to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. In his letter of presentation he wrote: "It seems to me to be a work of art which should be in a position where it can be permanently accessible to the public. In the gallery of the Museum this object will be obtained." Meissonier's "1807" was bought by Mr. Elbert Hilton, son of ex-Judge Hilton.

Six of the jurors in the case of Thomas Cleary, one of the members of the New York Board of Aldermen of 1884, who was on trial for accepting money for his vote granting the franchise of the Broadway Railroad, stood for acquittal and six for conviction, and the jury was discharged March 24.

In the Wisconsin Assembly a bill requiring railway companies to furnish annual passes, good in Wisconsin, to all members of the Legislature, elective State officers, and members of the courts of record, was passed by a vote of 49 to 33 on March 26.

A convention of the Knights of Labor in Pennsylvania is to meet in Harrisburg, April 7, to consider bills now pending before the Legislature and to establish a permanent committee to remain at Harrisburg and "assist in the passage" of bills which the Knights favor.

After the Republicans in Chicago had nominated Mr. John A. Roche for Mayor, the Democrats renominated Mayor Carter Harrison. He declined, and two unsuccessful efforts have since been made to agree on a candidate.

A company of Socialists in Chicago have threatened to kill a member of the Legislature of Illinois unless he retract criticisms of the conduct of two other members who attended the funeral of the wife of one of the imprisoned Anarchists, and thereby showed sympathy with them. A few days before this threat an effort was made to take the life of another member of the Legislature who had offended the Socialists.

Twenty thousand of the voters of St. Louis, who number not more than 45,000, have failed to register preparatory to the forthcoming municipal election.

A college for young women will be opened at Princeton in September, which is meant, with modifications of the Harvard plan, to be a Princeton "Annex." There will be two courses—the collegiate department and a preparatory department. Requirements for admission to the collegiate department will be the same as those of Princeton College. All the studies of the Freshman and Sophomore years except Greek will be required. In the two higher classes the regular course may be modified by lectures. An advanced course in the French and German languages and literature may be substituted for Greek, and other changes made as in the lecture system of Princeton College. The Rev. J. H. McIlvaine is principal, and most of the instruction will be given by professors of Princeton College.

The lumbermen in northern Maine, where the snow in many places is eleven feet deep in the roads, have found it necessary to shovel out places by the side of the road for their horses, and to haul food to them on hand sleds to keep them from starving.

Trains on the Northern Pacific Railroad crossed the bridge and trestle over the Missouri River at Bismarck, Dak., March 27, for the first time in eight days. The overflow is yet causing the destruction of much property, and the number of persons who are reported to have perished becomes larger.

The bark Scot's Bay, on its voyage from Fernandina to Lisbon, was capsized at sea March 22. One of the crew died from exposure, another was washed overboard, two colored seamen became insane and committed suicide, and the captain and one mate, the only remaining men of the crew, were rescued, nearly dead, on March 24.

The French steamship Scotia, approaching New York, ran ashore near Fire Island on the morning of March 25. She had nearly 900 Italian immigrants on board, who all, however, were safely put ashore and brought to New York by rail. The sea has been so high since the accident that the steamer had not on Tuesday been floated.

The transatlantic yacht race from Sandy Hook to Queenstown between the Coronet and the Dauntless for $10,000 a side was won by the former. She crossed the line off Roche's Point, Cork Harbor, Ireland, at 12:40 P. M., Queenstown time, March 27. The Dauntless arrived on the afternoon of March 28. The corrected time of the winner was 14 days 19 hours 3 minutes and 14 seconds. The voyage was a very stormy one, and gale after gale was encountered. Thursday, March 17, a fearful gale was blowing, at the rate of ninety miles per hour, and all that night the Coronet was hove to. The following Tuesday another gale struck the yacht, and she lay to for nearly twenty hours, making only 38 4-5 knots in the twenty-four hours. The greatest number of miles made in any one day was on last Saturday, when she made 291 miles, an average of over twenty miles per hour. The Coronet sailed in all 2,934 miles, which is within forty-four miles of the shortest course possible between the two points, and averaged within a very small fraction of 200 miles per day.

The report of the Bell Telephone Company made on March 29 to the annual meeting of its stockholders, shows that during the year there was an increase of 9,318 subscribers, against an increase of 2,969 in 1885. The company controls 14,185 miles of wire, 2,613 miles of which are under ground.

Mr. William R. Travers, who had been ill for some time at Bermuda, died there March 19, and his body was brought to this city on March 27. For many years he was a prominent figure in all places of public resort, in theatres, in club life, and on the race course, and it would be difficult to name any one whose face and figure would be missed more widely in New York. He was born in Baltimore in 1819. He was a merchant in his native city for several years, and he married a daughter of the late Reverdy Johnson. For more than thirty years he was a member of the New York Stock Exchange. His fortune is estimated to be $3,000,000. Judge Samuel H. Treat of the United States Court for the Southern District of Illinois died in Springfield March 27, in his seventy-fifth year. He was nominated to the bench of the Southern District of Illinois by President Pierce, March 3, 1855, and, out of the more than fifty men in the country holding like positions, there is but one who has served longer. It is said that the proportion of his decisions that have been reversed is at least as small as that of any other Judge upon the District Bench in the United States.

Other men of prominence who have died this week are the Rev. Ray Palmer of Newark and Mr. Paul Tulane of Princeton, N. J. Mr. Palmer was a well-known Congregational preacher and writer on religious subjects. He was the author of the hymn, "My Faith Looks Up to Thee." Mr. Tulane made a fortune as a cotton-dealer in New Orleans; and although he had long resided at Princeton, he founded and endowed the university at New Orleans that bears his name.

FOREIGN.

The conflict between the Irish party and the Tory officials in Ireland has again become sharp. The Parnellite Dublin paper United Ireland on March 23 spoke of the Secretary for Ireland as "the bloody Balfour with a tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide." When the police undertook on the same day to evict peasants at Carrickmacross, they found the cottages barricaded, and boiling water was poured on them from the upper windows. Another priest, Father Ryan, has been arrested for refusing to testify concerning his action as trustee for tenants under the plan of campaign.

Still another Irish priest, Father Slattery, has been sent to prison in Dublin for refusing to give information concerning the plan of campaign. The people gathered about the cab in which he was driven to jail in such numbers that the police rode with drawn swords to clear a lane for the cab. Mr. O'Brien, editor of United Ireland, with the Lord Mayor and Archbishop Croke, rode in the Lord Mayor's carriage to the prison.

Mr. Gladstone made a long speech in the House of Commons March 24, on the motion for urgency for the Coercion Bill, in which his main effort was to point out the difference between the Irish provocation for coercion now and in 1881 under his ministry. He contended that Irish crime then was of a different character from the present Irish crime, which is simply a combination to obtain a fair reduction of rent. He trusted that the people of England would see the Liberals united in opposing this ill-omened measure to the last stage, and that the Liberal members would ring out the voices of justice and reason against a Government which, after eighty-six years of experience, was preparing, under the name of a statute of Parliament, to strike a fresh blow at the life and happiness of Ireland and at the prosperity, contentment, and unity of the empire. Speaking of the application of closure, he said incidentally that he had seen more Parliamentary life than any other man in the House, but he never knew of so grave a state of affairs. It was due to an extreme abuse of power by the majority, which, if persisted in, would leave behind a sense of intolerable wrong.

The Irish Crimes Bill was explained in the House of Commons by Mr. Balfour, Secretary for Ireland, on March 28. Its chief features are to give to magistrates power to examine witnesses on oath, even when no persons are charged with crime; to give the Government power to change the venue for graver offences from Ireland to England, and to give the Viceroy power to proclaim dangerous societies found to be disturbing the peace. In his speech on the bill, Mr. Balfour said that to meet the difficulty of getting verdicts the Government proposed to abolish the jury system altogether for certain classes of crime, giving the magistrate jurisdiction, with power to impose a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment in cases of criminal conspiracy, boycotting, and the like. His speech provoked one of the most remarkable scenes of recent years in the House. A succession of contemptuous questions, jeers, interjections, suggested emendations, and mock encouragement to "go ahead," "keep it up," were shouted at him, and when he hesitated for a moment there was a chorus of cat-calls. On the front Opposition bench Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley sat side by side. Mr. Gladstone's face was flushed, a most unusual thing with him, in his excitement as the stringency of the measure became apparent. Mr. Dillon's reply to Mr. Balfour was an excited speech, in which he said: "If I thought they (the people of England) could accept such a measure, I would abandon public agitation, for I would consider that the man had the heart of a slave who would submit such a matter to agitation. I should do one of two things: I would leave for ever the country wherein no Irishman could live except like a slave, or, if the Irish people were willing, I would be proud and willing to lead them on to battle."

Mr. Gladstone spoke in opposition to the Irish Crimes Bill in the House of Commons March 29. He said that the bill, instead of being a cure for Irish ills or even a palliative, was a measure that would aggravate the deepest seated and worst disorders. "Among its most insulting and exasperating proposals," he declared, "the worst ever submitted to Parliament, is the provision that Irish trials be held in London. I have never known such a blow at the national feeling of Ireland. The Government could have devised nothing more likely to aggravate every existing evil. As to the permanent duration of the bill, the proposals make one's blood boil. To establish what was formerly only a temporary remedy as a permanent rule of existence for society in Ireland will put a brand of inferiority upon Ireland for ever, recognizing as a fixed principle that force is a remedy. The lesson of many years shows that force is no remedy."

Mr. Parnell on March 29, in a cable message to President Fitzgerald of the American Irish Land League, said that the Irish Crimes Bill is stringent, tyrannical, and uncalled for by the state of affairs in Ireland; and he appealed to the American people "for that sympathy and support which they have never withheld from a people struggling for liberty."

Queen Victoria has commanded all the members of the royal family to come to London to celebrate her jubilee.

The Duchess of Cumberland, youngest daughter of the King of Denmark, and sister of the King of Greece, the Czarina of Russia, and the Princess of Wales, was placed in a lunatic asylum near Vienna for melancholia on March 24.

The annual boat race between the crews of Oxford and Cambridge Universities was rowed March 26 over the usual course on the Thames from Putney to Mortlake, and was won by the Cambridge crew in twenty minutes and fifty-two seconds. The record of races won now stands: Oxford 23, Cambridge 20.

The formal challenge by the Royal Clyde Yacht Club of Glasgow, on behalf of the yacht Thistle for the America's cup, has been received by the Secretary of the New York Yacht Club. The races will be run next fall.

Mrs. James Brown Potter of New York made her début on March 29, at the Haymarket Theatre, London, as Anne Sylvester in Wilkie Collins's "Man and Wife." Many prominent persons were present. The critics are agreed that the character was not suited to Mrs. Potter, but they praise her for her effort, and predict a successful career for her.

Dr. Arthur Farre, F.R.S., the celebrated surgeon and medical writer, who was Physician Extraordinary to the Queen, died in London March 25 at the age of seventy-seven.

The Emperor of Germany, after the celebration of his ninetieth birthday, published an address to the people in which he said: "In my early youth I saw the monarchy of my deeply afflicted father under a direful visitation that tested the endurance of the people. I have since seen how the devoted loyalty, eager self-sacrifice, and undaunted courage of my people brought them deliverance and elevation, and now in old age, after the many vicissitudes of my life, I look with pride and satisfaction upon the great transformation which the glorious events of the recent past, the imperishable feeling of German unity, and the sincere love of the Fatherland have effected in Germany. May the consummation achieved, after long yearning, by our beloved country conduce—as I confidently hope it will—to ever-increasing prosperity, all classes of the nation living in the undisturbed and blessed labors of peace."

The Emperor received 1,648 telegrams congratulating him upon his birthday anniversary. Of these 1,297 came from different parts of Germany, 60 from America, and 5 from Canada. He has sent to Queen Victoria for her jubilee a service of Saxon china, composed of 500 pieces of the famous yellow tint. The centre piece, an enormous basket for fruit and flowers, is surmounted by a white and gold bust of the Queen, surrounded in its turn by a medallion portrait of all the royal family.

The Reichstag on March 28 passed to its third reading the budget, with the budget bills and the Loan Bill. Dr. Windthorst, the President, and the Vice-Presidents of the Reichstag were reëlected by acclamation for the remainder of the session, and the Reichstag then adjourned over the Easter holidays. The next sitting will be on April 19.

More movements have been made to overcome the French sympathy of the people of Alsace-Lorraine. A bill has been prepared for the Reichstag to limit the power of the Alsatian Diet and so to change the education law as gradually to abolish teaching in the French language.

Eleven Alsatians have been sentenced to imprisonment at Berlin for six months for wearing tri-colored ribbons there.

The Czar has made a reply to the address sent to him by the students of the University at St. Petersburg congratulating him on his escape from the recent plot to kill him, in which he said: "I thank the University and hope it will prove its devotion to me by deeds, not merely on paper, and endeavor to efface the grave impression which the part that a number of students took in the criminal design on my life has created in every one. May God bless and guide the University aright."

Evidence given in the case of the fifteen Anarchists on trial at Vienna shows that a well-laid plot to burn the whole city was discovered just in time to prevent its execution.

The garrisons of Madrid and other Spanish cities were ordered to be in readiness for immediate action on March 26, the Government fearing that a coup d'état would be attempted by revolutionists.

Subsequently the Governors of Barcelona, Seville, Valencia, Cadiz, Valladolid, and other provinces arrested persons suspected of complicity in a general revolutionary plot. The prisoners belong mostly to the lower classes.

The French Government continues to make unsuccessful efforts to prevent gambling at races. On Sunday at Longchamps many arrests were made for betting.

The Pope, as a mark of special honor to Archbishop Corrigan of New York, has named him Prelate Assistant to the Pontifical Throne.

Ditler Gothard Monrad, a well-known Danish ecclesiastic, Cabinet minister and author, died March 28. He was born in 1811 at Copenhagen. He had been a journalist, Minister of Public Worship and Education, Bishop of Laaland again Minister of Public Worship, and in the Cabinet of 1863 he was President and Minister of Finances. In 1865 he emigrated to Germany, but returned to Denmark in 1869 and resumed his place as Bishop.

The complicity of Egyptian officials in the fraudulent sale of State lands, and the existence of a ring in the Finance Ministry whereby the Egyptian Government has been defrauded of £90,000, have been discovered. An American, Mason Bey, who is at the head of the land department, has declared himself innocent and demanded an inquiry.

A despatch was received at London March 26 from Mr. Henry M. Stanley, saying that he arrived at the mouth of the Congo River on the morning of the 18th.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE REPUBLICANS.

THE selection of the Inter-State Commerce Commissioners was the most important act of President Cleveland's Administration, for the law which they are to enforce is, perhaps, with the exception of the Resumption Act, the most important piece of legislation enacted by Congress since the war. The first stage of its interpretation and application will, therefore, need great skill and patience, not only to make the act in any way beneficial to the business community, but to prevent its proving a source of great loss and confusion. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that its committal to the hands of a body of active politicians, in need of salaries and occupation, would have been a most disastrous thing. And yet President Cleveland might have done vastly better than this without doing nearly as well as he has done.

His success has, however, not only great commercial, but great political importance. It not only illustrates once more, and very strikingly, the extreme silliness of many of the maxims of political prudence as taught by professional politicians, but it does more than anything that has been done within five or six years to put our Republican friends—if we may use a bit of very expressive political slang—"in a hole." Of course, as we all know, it hardly needed a year of President Cleveland's Administration to get rid of the rubbish thrown up around his candidacy by the more violent Republican partisans during the canvass. He was not long in office before the scatterbrained youths who do the "arraigning" in the organic Republican press, ceased to "dismiss him with a smile," and laid aside the fear that he would issue a decree levying taxes on the Northern States to pay off the rebel debt and to compensate the slaveholders for the loss of their slaves. But he very speedily so raised the standard of administrative purity that the Republican press began to complain bitterly of his doing, occasionally, things which all the Republican Presidents had done as a rule, and which no politicians on either side had ever thought of finding fault with until he had shown that better things were possible. In fact, paradoxical as it seems, no such sterling compliments were ever paid to any President as the complaints which the Republican newspapers have made of President Cleveland's shortcomings, for it was he who taught them that they were shortcomings, and might reasonably be complained of.

The manner in which the Inter-State Commerce Commission has been filled has, however, apparently caused the President's opponents greater embarrassment than anything which has gone before. This time they have absolutely ceased to impute bad motives. Hitherto, when he has made an undeniably good appointment, attempts have been made to lessen its effect by alleging that it was made by way of paying some sort of debt to a wicked friend of the appointee, or that it was made as an offset to some particularly bad appointments made at the same time. In this case, however, the critics only break silence to applaud. Some, like the Boston Journal, are silent altogether, but others, like the New York Tribune, acknowledge, without reservation, that he has done well. All over the country his enemies, in fact, admit that he has behaved abominably well.

Now, the effect of this on Democratic policy is easy to see. But the effect on Republican policy, though a little more recondite, is also not hard to discern. It is evidently going to hasten some kind of change of base in preparation for the next campaign. The harder to beat Cleveland seems, the greater will be the number of Republicans who question whether it will be wise to go into the fight in 1888 with the same leaders and war cries as in 1884. A large number of Republican newspapers have for a good while been seriously considering how they are to get along in the next canvass without the aid of the rebel debt, rebel pensions, compensation for slaves, the old fear that a Democratic Administration would overthrow the Government, and the personal attacks on Mr. Cleveland which played so large a part in the last canvass. But they are now beginning to consider also how they are to get along in the teeth of his acknowledged official excellence, and in the teeth of the strong hold he is acquiring on the confidence of the business community. The tougher the job of defeating him, in case of his renomination, grows, of course the more stripping for the fray there is likely to be, and the more searching the investigation into the causes of the disaster in 1884. We think we know somebody who will suffer dreadfully from this investigation, and who will unquestionably be the first who will have to get out of the wagon as the load appears to grow heavier. One of the bad signs for him is the rapid disappearance, which we notice in many quarters, of the infantile delusion that the votes of cranks and "kickers," Pharisees and hypocrites, do not count at American elections.

GROWTH OF MUGWUMPISM.

THE spring elections of the odd years in several of the States ordinarily attract little national attention, as they concern only judicial offices in Michigan and Wisconsin, and the annual choice of a State ticket in Rhode Island usually passes almost unnoticed. This spring, however, these contests are everywhere of uncommon interest, and their results will be awaited with much curiosity.

Michigan elects next Monday two judges of the Supreme Court and two Regents of the State University. The Republicans apparently have greatly the advantage in point of candidates, one of their nominees for judge having been for nearly thirty years a distinguished member of the court. They are also aided by the demoralization among the Opposition. For several years the Democrats and Greenbackers in Michigan have "fused" on State and National tickets, and in this way they carried the judicial election in the spring of 1885. But there has been growing dissatisfaction with the union among both parties to it, and although the managers apparently favored a maintenance of the fusion, the rank and file rejected the idea, and the Democrats have a ticket of their own this spring for the first time in years. But the Prohibitionists worry the Republicans by maintaining their organization, although the Republicans in the Legislature have submitted a prohibition amendment to the Constitution, which is to be voted upon next week, and the Republican State Committee has issued an appeal for "active, united work" and "a full vote," which indicates serious apprehension as to the result. It is evident that the Democratic party of Michigan, demoralized as it has been by the fusion with the Greenbackers, has been greatly strengthened by Mr. Cleveland's course. The Republican Convention met just after the President's veto of the Pauper Pension Bill, and some of the managers thought they could make something out of that action, for they put in the platform a plank declaring that the Republican party adhered to its past record in caring for the soldiers, "and that it condemns all Executive vetoes tending to deprive them of this support whenever and wherever justly due." But it soon became plain that the Republican party could not fight against a pension veto supported by such Republican soldiers as Gen. Chamberlain of Maine, Gen. Cox of Ohio, and "Matt" Quay of Pennsylvania. It may be noted in passing that at the recent State encampment of the Grand Army, a Blaine delegate presented a resolution speaking disrespectfully of the President, whereupon "sharp hisses were given through the hall," and he was promptly suppressed.

Wisconsin elects next week an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and both parties acquiesce in the reëlection of the man whose term expires. The Milwaukee Sentinel says that "it has grown to be the usage of the people of Wisconsin not to make party nominations for Supreme Court judges, or, when party nominations are made, to defeat them." The same principle is being adopted in local elections. The Racine Journal says that the fusion of the Republicans and a part of the Democrats of that city last year upon a municipal ticket composed of candidates from both parties, was followed by excellent results, removing municipal politics from the field of partisanship and giving the city one of the best administrations it has ever had. The Milwaukee people propose to follow this example in filling the Circuit and Superior Court judgeships in that county. The "People's party," so called, which is really a combination of all the worst elements in the community, has put forth a ticket which was nominated by a Convention not more than six or eight of whose members were born in this country, and many of whom are not yet naturalized. These are sample names: Schilling, Blatz, Rudzinski, Czerwinski, Hanizeski, Andrzejewski, Neuka, Esche, Schleifer, Klefisch, Vogt, Lamm, Billerbeck, Chinsky, Grauvogel, Himmelstein, Doerfle, Herr, Meyer, Berg, Flintner, Dietrich, Norden, Maas, Schimmel, Theurig, Choinsky, Genz, Pautz, Schubert, Hornemann, Gmeiner, Koehler, Benzel, and Raduege. Last fall the Republicans and Democrats had separate tickets, and the organization run by Schilling elected the Sheriff, District Attorney, and other officers. This spring the friends of good government, without distinction of party, unite in the selection of candidates for judges, and everything promises the election of their ticket.

Chicago is approaching another election of Mayor, and one result of the contest is already assured—the retirement of Carter Harrison. This odious demagogue has long controlled the Democratic party and secured four elections to the Mayoralty. This year he again got a nomination from a subservient convention, but the decent Democrats at last revolted, and his overwhelming defeat was so manifestly assured that he has declined to run. Mr. Harrison attributes the revolt against him to the President, and in one sense he is right. Mr. Cleveland, of course, has not used his influence one way or the other in Chicago municipal politics, but his example has lifted the standard of the Democratic party so high that self-respecting Democrats will no longer vote, even under protest, for such a man as Harrison.

The greatest public interest in any spring election attaches to the contest in the smallest State. Rhode Island elections for a long while have been so one-sided that nobody has paid much attention to them. The Republican Machine appeared to have a firm grip upon the little commonwealth. But the ring has grown so overbearing and offensive that a large element of the Republican party has at last declared against it, and there is a hopeful prospect of its overthrow. It is evident that only one thing can save the Republican ticket—a vast corruption fund; and venal as a large proportion of Rhode Island voters notoriously are, it looks as though even this might not prove effectual. Certain it is that many hundreds of Republicans of the highest character will vote against the Republican ticket next week Wednesday, and it can only be elected by replacing their loss with the worst elements of the Democracy.

It will thus be seen that Mugwumpism is growing both in the East and the West. The effect of this development upon the national canvass of 1888 is already perceptible. You cannot persuade a man to vote for the best candidate in a municipal or State election, and then make him believe that in a Presidential election he must vote for the party candidate if he is not the best man. The appetite for Mugwumpism grows by what it feeds on, and the practice of independent voting in municipal and State elections involves the certain defeat of the Republican party next year if it presents a candidate offensive to the independent voters. The acknowledgment by so many Republican newspapers of prominence during the past month that Mr. Blaine's renomination would certainly defeat the Republican party, shows that the power of the Mugwump is at last appreciated.

THE FIELD CODE AT ALBANY.

WHATEVER be the merits or demerits of the Field Code, we will ask our readers whether they can recall anything in the history of legislation quite as scandalous as the manner in which it is sought to impose this much condemned code upon the people of this State. There are many codes in force in different civilized countries, but not one which was forced on the community in defiance of the protests of the leading jurists of the State, and by direct appeals to the ignorance and prejudice of legislators, or pushed with an air of authority by callow journalistic youths who have taken up codification as a "topic." No other civilized state has been seriously asked to make a change in the whole body of its law condemned by the great majority of the bar, and strenuously advocated by nobody but a very aged gentleman who had composed it.

Consider, too, for one moment the means to which the codifier resorts year after year to procure its enactment. We venture to assert that his ways as a lawgiver are absolutely unprecedented. The main argument which he uses with the legislators is that the lawyers who condemn his work—the only men in the community who can judge it intelligently—are actuated solely or mainly by the fear that it will diminish their practice, or, in other words, by purely mercenary motives, as if it could make any difference to a people whose bar was in this condition what kind of laws they had. And he and his newspaper acolytes use this argument while knowing well, as we cannot help believing, that it is the infinite variety of human transactions which causes litigation, or, in other words, that it is over the application of the law, no matter how clear its provisions may be, that disputes arise, and that nothing can ever seriously diminish the number of lawsuits except an exact similarity between facts, which is as unattainable as an exact similarity between faces.

Moreover, the passage of the code in the Legislature is actually pushed by precisely the same arts as any scheme of the city lobby, namely, by appeals to the ignorance and prejudice and party feelings of the legislators. Young Mr. Ives, who is working for it, procured its final passage in the Assembly by arguments which had no more to do with its merits, or with the defects of the common law, than with the High-License Bill—that is to say, he got half-a-dozen totally indifferent members who were lounging round the lobbies to vote for it, in order to oblige him, and they did it in much the same spirit in which they would have taken a drink with him, or helped him to get the name of a village changed. Nor can we neglect a story which is current at Albany, and which, whether true or false, furnishes an excellent illustration of the state of mind in which the Legislature and the lobby approach the question of enacting the code. It is said that ten Senators have formed a "combine," have agreed to hang together, and have given Mr. Field to understand that they will vote for the code for $1,000 apiece. It is even said, and also believed, that the Manhattan Railway Company is being "worked" for the code, and that a Senator or Assemblyman can have "a man" put into the employ of that institution by vigorously assailing the common law. We repeat that we have no means of knowing whether these stories are true or false; but a good many people undoubtedly believe them, and they show the kind of atmosphere in which the code is being debated and likely to be disposed of.

We feel very sure, however, that Mr. Field will not pay for the passage of his code, or at all events will not pay any such sum as this. But, although we dislike to say it of so old a man, he is not ingenuous in his dealings with the Legislature. It is his practice at Albany (and his example has been followed by a good many of those who support him) to quote to the Legislature the favorable things said by various distinguished persons about codification, and then to assume that his particular code is entitled to the benefit of them. This method, of course, imposes on a good many who have not given the subject much consideration. It broke down in an amusing way last week when he triumphantly quoted to the Senate Committee Sheldon Amos and Frederick Pollock, leading English advocates of codification, without being aware that they had both recently pronounced the Field Code a mischievous failure. The production of these particular opinions of course made a somewhat humorous dramatic "situation." Prof. Holland, another leading English codifier, repudiates the code. The tide of knowledge and reason is, in truth, running steadily against this, we trust, last attempt to force this ill-considered change in the law upon the people of this State. Mr. James C. Carter's address to the Committee of the Senate on the 23d was a fresh and extraordinarily forcible presentation of the objections to it, and we recommend it to the perusal of everybody, whether lawyer or layman, who is opposed to reckless and haphazard dealing with great public interests

The last number of the Political Science Quarterly, published by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia College—which we consider much the most promising attempt yet made in this country to found a journal devoted to the philosophy of law and politics—has an exceedingly able discussion of the question of codification by Judge Dillon and another by Mr. Frederick J. Stimson and Prof. Munroe Smith. Judge Dillon describes what he calls "our legal chaos," meaning the difficulty of extracting the law from the mass of reports and statutes in which it is now buried, and declares himself an advocate of codification as defined by Mr. Justice Stephen, who says:

> "A code ought to be based upon the principle that it aims at nothing more than the reduction to a definite and systematic shape of the results obtained and sanctioned by the experience of many centuries."

A more epigrammatic way of condemning the Field Code could hardly have been hit on—for that code seeks not only to "smash" the common law, as obsolete rubbish, but to substitute, on many important points, for "the experience of many centuries" the experience of Mr. D. D. Field. Judge Dillon amplifies somewhat Judge Stephen's definition by suggestions of his own, and pronounces the making of such a code "practicable and expedient whenever it can be well and thoroughly done," and says that "the best interests of the community and the profession require that the work, great and difficult, choice and tender as it is, should be undertaken, and that it cannot be much longer delayed." This means, of course, that it has not yet been undertaken by any competent person, which is true.

Prof. Munroe Smith makes some very interesting observations on the facts furnished by Mr. Stimson touching the tendencies of American State legislation. He shows that the encroachment of statute on the common law ceased in all the older States fifty years ago; that the disposition now in all the older communities is to let alone "private law," that is, that portion of the law which regulates individual activities, or, in other words, to leave it to be moulded as now by the judges. and to embody in codes and statutes "public [i. e., political] law," only—in other words, that portion of the law which concerns the public interest as distinguished from private interest. The distinction is an important one, and has also been dwelt on by Mr. Carter in the address to which we have referred above. The whole article is well worth attentive reading. It concludes with the following judgment on the Field Code:

"The code which has been most fully investigated is that which was prepared for New York, but which has not been adopted in this State. It has twice been passed by the Legislature and vetoed by the Governor; it has twice been rejected by the Legislature. It is again before the Legislature at this moment. Although it has not been adopted by the State for which it was prepared, it has been adopted as the civil code of California.

"This code is not an accurate presentation of our common law. The testimony of the lawyers of California, who are living under it, and the testimony of the lawyers of New York, who are afraid that they may have to live under it, agree upon this point. Nor is it scientifically satisfactory in its general plan or in its details. Its general arrangement is based upon that of the Code Napoléon, an arrangement which is now regarded, in Europe, as antiquated and unsatisfactory. It reproduces some of the worst features of that code, particularly in its abundance of definitions and rules of interpretation.

"That these matters should not be inserted in a code is now a maxim of European codification."

TAXED AND UNTAXED LIQUOR.

We publish in another column a table of statistics showing that in a dozen or more of the larger cities of the country the proportion of liquor-saloons to population varies according to the license fee charged; that as the fee goes up in size, the number of saloons decreases; and that as it diminishes, the number of saloons increases. Since that table was made up, statistics have come to hand showing that in every instance in which prohibition has been tried it has resulted, not in the suppression of the liquor traffic, often not even in a restriction of it, but in allowing it to be carried on free from all tax to the State; that in every instance in which high license has been adopted, it has acted as a restraint upon the traffic, and has largely increased the revenues of the State; and that in no case has such license failed greatly to reduce the number of saloons.

These statistics were collected by an eminent jurist of Michigan, Mr. D. Bethune Duffield, and were presented by him to a recent meeting in Detroit which had been called to give popular protest against a proposition to repeal the liquor-tax law of Michigan and substitute for it a prohibitory law. Mr. Duffield showed first how completely prohibition has failed of its object. In Vermont, after thirty years of prohibition, the United States revenue returns show 446 open saloons. In Iowa, there were, before the prohibitory law was enacted, 3,834 liquor-dealers; in 1886, under prohibition, there were 4,033, and a total manufacture of 5,894,545 gallons of liquor, with no revenue to the State. In Kansas, before the prohibitory law, there were 2,339 liquor-dealers; under the prohibitory law there were, in 1886, 1,850 with no revenue to the State. In Maine, after about thirty years of prohibition, there were, in 1886, 1,262 liquor-dealers, of whom 1,156 were retailers of spirituous liquors, and 100 dealers in malt liquors, a proportion of one liquor-dealer to every 515 of the population. In the city of Bangor there are 140 open saloons, or one for every 120 of the population. In Portland there are 150 saloons, or one to every 225 of the population. Neal Dow, the "father of prohibition," said in an interview published on September 11, 1886, "There is not a city or town in Maine in which the law is not entirely ignored," and "intoxication in this State has not been perceptibly lessened." The State gets no revenue from the traffic.

In Rhode Island the results of the first six months of prohibition, as revealed by carefully prepared statistics, show that there are 1,369 dealers now, against 1,471 under license, and an innumerable number of "clubs" or secret selling places; that the enforcement of the law in the courts has been a total failure in all parts of the State save Newport County, where it has been pretty well enforced by local authorities. There is no revenue to the State.

Now let us see what the results are in States in which taxation of the traffic prevails, beginning with Michigan, for which Mr. Duffield gives some very remarkable figures. After twenty years of prohibition the State had in 1874 6,444 saloons, or one for every 207 inhabitants. In May, 1875, a tax law was passed which required every retail seller of spirituous or mixed liquors to pay an annual tax of $300, every wholesale dealer $500, and every retail or wholesale dealer in malt liquors alone $200. In 1876, one year after the law went into effect, the returns showed that the number of dealers had been reduced from 6,444 to 4,867, a decrease of 1,577. In 1877, the returns showed only 3,996 dealers, a further reduction of 871. In 1882, six years after the law had gone into effect, there were in the State only 3,461 saloons, or one to every 536 of the population. Here was a decrease since 1874 of 2,983 saloons, nearly 50 per cent. All this had been accomplished in spite of the increase of population. If the ratio of saloons to population which existed under the prohibition law had continued under the tax law, the State would have had, in 1882, 8,966 saloons, instead of 3,461, and would have today 10,000 instead of less than 5,000. The revenue to the State under the tax law has been up to date $8,166,921.

In Ohio similar results have been accomplished. The first year's returns under the tax law show that in 70 of the 88 counties 1,019 saloons have been extinguished, and $1,494,000 has been paid into the Treasury in taxes. Gov. Foraker says: "The most reliable data obtainable indicate that the tax law has suppressed a large percentage of the saloons, and that practical prohibition has been secured under the local-option feature of the Dow law in at least 150 municipal corporations of this State."

In Illinois, where the High-License Law went into effect in 1883, the results are no less striking. There were in the State in 1883 about 13,000 saloons, from which the State received a revenue of about $700,000, a license of $52 each. Sixteen months after the law went into effect the number of saloons had been reduced to 9,000, and the revenue derived from that source increased to $4,500,000. In that brief period 4,000 saloons had been wiped out of existence. In Chicago alone over 1,000 disappeared in one year. In Springfield, the capital city of the State, the number of saloons had been reduced a few months later from 157 to 104, while the revenue from that source had risen from $17,000 to $52,000 per annum, or 200 per cent. In Peoria, before the High-License Law went into effect, there were 220 saloons, paying license fees aggregating $22,000. In March of 1885 the number of saloons had been reduced nearly one-half and the revenue therefrom increased to $63,000 a year, or nearly trebled.

It is unnecessary to say a word in support of figures like these. If the prohibition advocates would stop reasoning from their feelings and look at accomplished results, they would all be in favor of high license as the only practical remedy for the evil they are fighting.

SOME WAGNER LETTERS.

"Fifteen Letters by Richard Wagner" is the heading of an article printed in the February and March numbers of the Rundschau, and including the full text of the letters. They were addressed to the writer of the article, Frau Eliza Wille, the wife of a Hamburg journalist who had wearied of public strife and settled in a Swiss village, Mariafeld, near Zürich, devoted to agriculture and the education of his children. In the eyes of all who worship musical genius, Frau Wille was a remarkably privileged person. Not only did she entertain Wagner for a whole summer at her house, when he was completing his "Meistersinger" score; she was also one of the first to hear parts of the "Tristan" music, and the Nibelung poems, which Wagner first read at her house. Moreover, she knew Chopin and Liszt. Indeed, as a girl in Paris, she once had occasion to indulge in a frivolous pastime which the muse Terpsichore herself would have envied her—that of dancing to the four-hand performance on the piano of Chopin and Liszt. She relates that she had never heard any one play Chopin's music with such refinement and clearness as his own performance showed. One evening she gave him a poem which she had written on Poland, whereupon he sat down and improvised with such a wonderful wealth of ideas and sentiment that the hostess pressed her hand and said she had never heard Chopin play like that.

Wagner she first met at Dresden in 1843, when "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman" had just been brought out. She was impressed by "the elegant, mobile figure, the head with its great forehead, the keen eye, and the energetic lines about the small and firmly-closed mouth. An artist who sat next to me called my attention to the straight, projecting chin, which, as if chiselled in stone, impressed a special character on the face." Nine years later Wagner was for the first time a guest at Mariafeld. He arrived in company with the poet Herwegh. It was through Herwegh that Wagner was first introduced to the works of his favorite author, Schopenhauer, which Herwegh had brought with him to Mariafeld. Wagner fairly devoured them. "He and Herwegh were astounded at the solution of the world-mystery." They spent much time discussing them, together with such subjects as alliteration and the Edda poems. At a later period, when Wagner was again staying at Mariafeld, he commonly had a volume of Schopenhauer in hand when he was not at his work. "No one has penetrated more deeply than I into the spirit of this philosopher," he said to Frau Wille. Herr Wille frequently called on Schopenhauer when he was at Frankfort. "Do you remember," Wagner said one day to Frau Wille, "what greeting from Schopenhauer your husband once brought me? 'Tell your friend Wagner that I am obliged for the copy of his Nibelungen which he sent me, but he ought to give up music—he is more of a poetic genius. I, Schopenhauer, shall remain faithful to Rossini and Mozart.' Do you suppose," Wagner added, "that I bore the philosopher a grudge on that account?" There was, indeed, little occasion to heed the opinion of a man who played the flute, and who admired Rossini because he absolutely disregarded the text of his operas.

During his ten years' residence in and near Zürich Wagner did not, according to Frau Wille, share the dreary fate of other exiles. His fame had preceded him, and "every one felt honored to receive a kind word from him." He did not take much part in local musical affairs, but on one occasion he gave a concert at which selections from his own works were produced, and which aroused much enthusiasm among the audience as well as the musicians. One old 'cellist remarked that "when he is with us we all seem new men and musicians." On one occasion Wagner had accepted an invitation to act as judge at a vocal contest in Wallis; but at the last moment he changed his mind and declined. "Wagner did not approve of four-part male choruses," Frau Wille remarks; "except for warlike utterances, a chorus without female voices seemed unnatural to him." Such sorrows of exile as Wagner did know in Switzerland came entirely from the unpromising outlook of his affairs at home. True, his early operas were gradually making their way in the German opera-houses, but the leading opera-houses—at Vienna, Berlin, Munich—where alone they could be satisfactorily rendered, were the last to produce them; and the manner in which his own and other operas were commonly rendered always disgusted and discouraged Wagner. The Vienna authorities refused Wagner's offer to write for them a new opera ("Die Meistersinger"), but gave an order instead to Offenbach; while the Berlin Intendant refused even to see Wagner when he called on him! His finances, too, were exceedingly low, and this added to the depression of his spirits while he was at Wille's house. A Russian princess, enamored of his music, had promised her assistance; but when it came to the test she was found wanting. Other letters of unpleasant contents damped his spirits and interrupted his work on "Die Meistersinger."

One day he exclaimed to Frau Wille: "I am differently organized, have sensitive nerves, must have beauty, splendor, and light! The world owes me what I need! I cannot be content with a miserable organist's position, like your Master Bach! Is it really an unheard-of demand if I claim a right to the little bit of luxury which I like—I, who am preparing enjoyment for the world and for thousands!" Some years previously to this outburst, Liszt had remarked to Wille that he knew of no opera-house good enough for Wagner: that he needed a stage, vocalists, an orchestra—in short, everything—according to his own notions. Wille retorted that that would probably cost over a million (francs); whereupon Liszt suddenly exclaimed prophetically, and in French, as usual when he was excited: "Il l'aura! Le million se trouvera." The prediction was fulfilled; and it was while Wagner resided at Mariafield with the Willes that the young King of Bavaria despatched a special messenger to find Wagner and bring him to Munich. But Wagner had left just two days before without explaining why—apparently to make a tour of the German opera-houses.

He first stopped at Stuttgart, whence he wrote to Frau Wille that he had attended a performance at the opera which inspired him "with deadly disgust." In the next letter, dated May 4, 1864, he writes to her about the King: "You know that the young King of Bavaria sent a messenger to find me. To-day I was brought before him. He is, alas, so beautiful and sympathetic, so emotional and delightful, that I am afraid his life must fade away in this common world like a divine dream. He loves me with the depth and ardor of first love; he knows all about me and understands me like my own soul. He wants me to be with him always, to work, to rest, to produce my works; he will give me everything I need: I am to finish my Nibelungen, and he will have them performed as I wish. I am to be my own unrestricted master, not Kapellmeister—nothing but myself and his friend." May 26 is the date of another very long letter, in which occur these passages:

"In the year when my 'Tannhäuser' was first performed (the work with which I entered on my new thorny path), in the month of August, when I was filled with such an exuberance of creative impulse that I sketched 'Lohengrin' and 'Die Meistersinger' at the same time, a mother gave birth to my guardian angel. At the time when I was finishing my 'Tristan' at Lucerne, and was making unspeakable efforts to secure permission to live on German territory (Baden), and finally, in despair, turned to Paris, there to engage in undertakings against which my spirit revolted—at that time the youth of 15 first heard a performance of my 'Lohengrin,' which moved him so deeply that from that date he educated himself by the study of my works and writings in such a manner that he now frankly confesses to his surrounding, as to me, that I was really his sole educator and teacher. He followed up my career and my troubles, my disagreeable Parisian experiences, my misfortunes in Germany, and now his sole wish is to have the power to prove his supreme love for me. The only sore trouble of the youth was to comprehend how to secure from his obtuse surroundings this necessary sympathy for me. Early in March, of this year, I remember the day, I became convinced that any attempt to improve my situation must fail; openly and defenceless I confronted all the abominable indignities inflicted on me, when, quite unexpectedly, the King of Bavaria died, and my compassionate guardian angel—contrary to all fate—mounted the throne. Four weeks later his first care was to send for me. While I was, with your compassionate assistance, draining the cup of misery to the dregs, his messenger was already searching for me at my empty house in Penzing; he had to bring the loving King a lead pencil, a pen, belonging to me. How and when he found me you know already. . . .

"He now resides mostly in a small castle in my neighborhood; in ten minutes the carriage brings me into his presence. Daily he sends for me once or twice, and I always fly as to a beloved. Our intercourse is most delightful. Such a thirst for knowledge, such understanding, such reckless eagerness and enthusiasm, have never been my happy lot."

The King presented him, among other things, with a portrait for which he sat expressly for Wagner. In September Wagner writes again to his friend:

"Now I have a young King who really loves me ecstatically; you cannot conceive what this means. I remember a dream which I had as a youth: I dreamed that Shakspere was living, and that I saw him and spoke to him actually and in person. I have never forgotten the impression which this made on me, and which aroused the desire in me to see Beethoven (who, too, was no longer among the living). Somewhat similar must be the feelings of this amiable young man in having me. He tells me he can hardly believe that I am really his! His letters to me no one can read without astonishment and delight. Liszt remarked that his receptivity, as shown in them, was on the same lofty plane as my productivity. Believe me, it is a miracle!"

One of the main reasons why Wagner soon found himself surrounded by enemies at Munich was the belief that he had an equally great influence on the King in political matters. But this was not the case; for, as Wagner remarked to Wille, the "King looked at the ceiling and began to whistle" whenever Wagner began to talk politics. Nevertheless, how universal this erroneous belief was, is shown by the following extract from the letter just quoted. The reference is to Lassalle:

"The unhappy man came to me (through Bülow), just fourteen days before his death, to beg me to intercede with the King in behalf of the Swiss Ambassador (Dönniges). (For I am considered simply an omnipotent favorite; the other day the relatives of a female poisoner implored my protection!) What do you say to that? I had never before met Lassalle; on this occasion I disliked him heartily. It was a love affair, prompted purely by vanity and false pathos. I recognized in him the type of our prominent men of the future, which I must call the Germanic-Jewish."

Whatever may have been King Ludwig's eccentricities, it is probable that the world would never have seen Wagner's last two or three works had it not been for his encouragement and support; and certainly the general appreciation of Wagner's genius would have been retarded a decade or two. This fact invests the present correspondence with a double interest.

BRADFORD'S INDEX TO CLEMENCIN'S COMMENTARY ON DON QUIXOTE.—I.

YALE COLLEGE, March 26, 1887.

IN the year 1781, about 175 years after the publication of the 'Quixote,' the first commentary thereon saw the light. It was prepared, after long study of the language, literature, and the book itself, by an enthusiastic clergyman of the Church of England, in the quaint old town of Salisbury. The Rev. John Bowle thus filled a large quarto volume of 588 pages with one of the best expositions ever written of a difficult author, which he added to the two volumes of a carefully edited reprint of the original text. With its full indexes, it has supplied an accessible storehouse of Cervantistic information for all lovers of the hero of La Mancha, and has furnished the chief source of suggestion and matter to subsequent miners in the same lode. It is not surprising that that enlightened and hard-worked scholar, Gregorio Mayans y Siscar, said in 1778 to Mr. Dillon, referring to Bowle's forthcoming edition of Cervantes: "I am ashamed for my country to learn of such an enterprise accomplished by a foreigner."

Fifty years more passed by, when at last a Spanish antiquarian of ability, well known by his valuable documentary essay on the life and character of Isabel the Catholic (Madrid, Sancha, 1820), brought to conclusion in 1831 a voluminous second commentary on the 'Don Quixote,' which was thought to be an exhaustive ne varietur work, destined to leave the world, according to an expressive native phrase, con la boca abierta—i. e., aghast with wonder and admiration. The first three volumes came forth from the neat presses of Aguado at Madrid in 1833, in a sort of Spanish small-quarto size, when the author fell under the weight of his sixty nine years, just as a more hopeful political future seemed to be dawning on his oppressed country. Able friends, however, quickly came to the rescue of the completed manuscript, and in 1835, 1836, and 1839 the remaining three volumes appeared, fulfilling the author's design. The notes were printed on each page in smaller type under the text, and are so abundant and full as often to leave but a small strip of the latter visible to the eye.

But neither Clemencin nor the editors of his posthumous tomes had thought to crown their labors by subjoining a complete index to the six volumes of annotations. As a consequence, though admired and praised, and bought and pointed to, they were not read, and soon found themselves relegated to the honorable exile of dusty bookshelves, among other inaccessible treasures that find their way into every well-stored collection, more pro dignitate than pro utilitate. We acquired the work some twenty years ago in Madrid, read it through then, but never could afterwards seem to hit upon a note that we desired to review for private or public use. We have spent from two to three days in anxious "hunting" for a gem we remembered to have met with once, but, alas! without success. We shipped the set over to America with our Spanish library in '78, not caring to part with it, yet never more venturing to consult it.

At length, or rather in the meantime, Mr. Bradford, set on years ago by that great and excellent man, George Ticknor—in days when there was something of a Spanish atmosphere about Boston—went to work, and little by little succeeded in raising the dead Clemencin to newness of life (con perdón sea dicho), vitalizing the abandoned carcasses of the worthy volumes, and turning afresh the tide of literary pilgrimage to the old devotion, with a secure pledge of rapid transit into the very heart of the shrine. The dark passages and Avernian responses of the prodigious knight are now served on your desk with the germane references, the fraternal hints, and multitudinous cross-road sign-posts, that innocently disembowel the author without so much as a groan or a victim.

We had occasion lately to wonder what old Clemencin would have to say about Spanish gypsies, of whom Cervantes was a special pal. The suggestion, however, did not evoke more emotion than a smile, until we suddenly remembered, and rushed to our shelves for Bradford. Yes, sure enough, there it was under "Gitanos: a long note on the history, life, and customs of the gypsies, and the legislation touching them, ii, 473-478"—a saving of days of research, seas of patience, and dictionaries of figurative anathemas, with a fine article dished out for you, reaching from the times of those pious sovereigns who drove out the Moors and Jews, but could not get rid of the gypsies, down to the impious Ferdinand, who completed the desolation by exiling men who had modern ideas.

To this laborious compilation, which long remained in the chrysalis state of a manuscript, the Nation called public attention in 1874. Since then, the whole work has been uniformly Hispanicized and published at Madrid, under the patronage of the Academia de la Lengua, in a neat square octavo of some six hundred pages, so that it can stand in worthy harmony with the primeval Commentary as volume vii.* This index reproduces often the substance of the notes under natural catchwords arranged in alphabetic order, with all the excellences and, we must add, defects, of Clemencin. It is a misfortune that the defects were not corrected and the false statements met by the critical light which fifty years have thrown over the text and study of Cervantes. But even as it is, the Index is a monument of painstaking industry, and will ever be invaluable as a pathfinder to the once hopeless labyrinth which the Murcian, Diego Clemencin, left behind in 1834. Henceforth the only limit to the study of this Commentary will be its own insufficiency, resulting in part from the period in which it was prepared, the peculiar want of sympathy between the annotator and his subject, the great advance in our knowledge of the sixteenth century, and of the true etymology and signification of the language.

When the 'Quixote' came forth, the public found the book filled with a string of terms cropping out here and there that equalled the best Sunday "Shelta" of Monipodio's gang in the Triana of Seville. There being no Hidalgo to interpret this "flash jib" of the roads, and the native scholars not knowing what it meant so well as their water-carriers and mozos de cordel did, it has been dressed up to suit customers of the dainty sort, and the dictionaries have handed down the empty conjectures, or wisely left them alone. We are now going to take the liberty of pointing out a blemish or two in Clemencin, leaving in the inkstand a gross or more of similar ones, showing the way in which Spanish scholars misinterpret their own words and idioms and even customs.

¿Á qué diablos se pudre?—No wonder Clemencin did not understand this phrase of a class of people he never ventured to look at, for pudrir did not make its appearance in the Academy's Dictionaries till 1822, and he probably used the previous one of 1817. Foreign vocabularies, however, had given it for two hundred years before! Shelton translates in 1620: "Assuredly, master mine, quoth Sancho, a small matter makes you angry: why the devill doe you pine that I make use of my own goods?" Dominguez shows it means "fret"—molestarse, inquietarse.

Alcaná de Toledo.—What Hebrew word signifies a "fair" or a "market" that corresponds in any degree with this form? Qânah in Hebrew means to buy; true, but where does the al come from? Ah, from the Arabic article, says Covarrubias (1611). Then why not make the whole Arabic, as Dozy does—al-khânât, the shops, and alcaná, the place in Toledo where the Jews had their bazars?

Alfana.—From a purely imaginary female steed invented by Boiardo (1495), adopted by Ariosto (1516), and introduced into Spain by the early translators of the respective Orlandos, the serious idea of a "breeding mare, wilde and strange," found its place in the Italian 'Worlde of Wordes' (Florio, 1598, 1611; Torriano, 1659), which from 1726 the Academics of Madrid were not slow to transform into a "stout, athletic, mettlesome horse"; and this would not have been so compromising, had they not allowed their latest native etymologist to dress up the mythic mare as an Arab, called from alfaindn, because of his (her?) "long flowing mane"! Who can this Don Cuyo be who hath thus found an etymon from Mecca for a visionary steed?

Amadis.—"Estravaus (Des travaux)," why not "es travaux," which is the old French for en les as still appears in bachelier ès lettres, maître ès arts, etc., pronounced èze?

Apellidos.—Clemencin's derivations of patronymics in ez from the Latin genitive in i is about on a par with philological attainments in the Peninsula, where Diez, Mahn, and Dozy are ignored—doubtless because foreigners. We have shown in another place (Gram., p. 16 n) that the ending is not Teutonic, as the Germans insist, but simply the ablative plural. Thus Lainez or Laynez =[de] Latinis of the Latini family; Ordoñez = Fortuniis, of the Fortunii; so Pelagius makes Pelayo and Peláez and Páez, [de] Pelagiis. The Italian formation is identical, save that, according to the genius of their language, the final s is dropped: Galileo de' Galilei(s), Martino de' Martini(s).

Apodos (nicknames, epithets).—The pueblo de la Reloxa (as Cervantes wrote it) might have been Logroño, the pueblo of the Province of La Rioja; but we do not believe cazoleros to be a false reading for cazalleros, and still less that it referred to the noble martyr Dr. Augustin Cazalla (and not Cazalle as given), burned to the stake with all his family in 1559, on the spot where the railway station of Valladolid now stands, for upholding the immortal banner of Protestant principles. One would have supposed that an American Protestant would have boldly maintained the memory and dignity of Dr. Cazalla, especially since the nation that rejoiced in his agony that day has sunken to its present degree of degradation in Europe.

Arábigos (vocablos).—It would have been well to say that the Spanish idea that all words beginning with al are Arabic, was first stated ex cathedra by Nebrija or Lebrija in his Spanish Grammar of 1492. So much were his books read in the schools in the sixteenth century (like Lilly in England) that the nation became saturated with this inexact statement. From the same source came the idea that the x (now j) was received from the Moors. The x was, however, pronounced sh in his day, and that was the sound he referred to. There was no Spanish guttural taught in the grammars till that of Doergangk, 1614, so that "Don Quixote" was pronounced by Cervantes as the Germans would pronounce Kichôte, and not Kĭchôtĕ—nearly as sh, a palato-lingual sound, German ich, manch, berg.

Arrús.—Our commentator here delivers a hard hit at Bowle, because he does not understand voto á Rus, and adds: "But how should a foreigner comprehend our delicacies?" Of course we have a right to expect now a startling revelation, but, alas! after a reference to Pellicer, who thinks it is—well, nothing in particular, it results that nobody knows—no se sabe. Why, it is simply the modern voto á Briós, which Spaniards, not comprehending, write voto á bríos, as if it were brioches, or something good to eat—the older French par bieu, modern parbleu, a euphemism for voto á Dios. Breton often puts into the mouth of his coarser characters voto á Cribas (= á Cristo). These cunning devices to avoid the comfort of a naughty word are heard every day, in any country, when some one steps on your toes or otherwise deserves an energetic response.

Borla.—This is not the birrete (bonete), but the tassle attached to the hat, marking the grade, so that a Doctor de tres borlas is a doctor in civil law, canonical law, and in utroque jure.

Brindis (toast).—Clemencin makes the astounding assertion that this is the only word in the language that has the same form for both numbers. If Mr. Bowle had made such a statement, he might indeed have been excused on the plea of being a "foreigner," but Mr. Bowle would never have exhibited the like ignorance of a language he had studied fourteen years. There is not only crisis, and paréntesis, which are invariable for number, but all atonic endings in is and es belong to the same category. Brindis is the German bring dir's (provincial English, Here's t'ye).

Buen (al) callar llaman Sancho.—Amador de los Rios, in the complete edition of the works of the Marquis de Santillana (Iñigo Lopez de Mendoza, 1398-1458), gives this proverb wrongly (p. 504), for in the ancient MS, which we have seen, it is properly written sancho, not Sancho. Sbarbi, who published Santillana's collection of "sayed-sawes and adages," as the quaint How ell puts it, gives the right reading: al buen callar llaman sancho (p. 71). It is one of the oldest Spanish proverbs and a good specimen of popular etymology. The Latin sanctus gave as the organic hispanization sancho (consecta [seges] = cosecha, crop when cut), and the learned form sancto, modern santo. But as sancho, the people's Spanish for sanctus, came to collide with the proper name Sancho (from Low-Latin Sancius), the organic term was replaced by the learned, and sancho, holy, a saint, was forgotten. So it reads, "a good keeping your tongue is called saintly"—or, as we say, "Silence is golden." There are scores of examples in Spanish philology where colliding forms diverge, often by assimilation, as in perro for pedro (from patrius [canis] and Petrus), because the proper name made regularly

* Indice de las Notas de D. Diego Clemencin en su edicion de 'Don Quijote de la Mancha.' Por Carlos F. Bradford. Madrid.

Pedro too. Spain had many dogs—all "foreign," wherefore she hated them—as canis gallicus, galgo, the "French" dog; canis gothicus, gozque (gothici), the "Gothic" dog; canis sabaudus, sabueso, the "Savoy" dog; canis bodincus, podenco, the Po or "Italian" dog; canis alanus, alano, the Alani's dog, and cdravo, from the Arabic kelb (Fuero Viejo de Cast, p. 73 n); so they called the native dog (canis) patrius, "our dog" (Español rancio), attracting the vowels, according to their wont, into paitro, petro, pedro, and then assimilating for the above reason into perro.

WOLSELEY ON LEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just finished reading Gen. Lord Wolseley's article on Gen. Lee, in Macmillan's Magazine, and cannot forbear the expression of my astonishment that such wretched trash could emanate from an officer above the grade of subaltern. The ignorance of facts and the incapacity for military criticism exhibited by our British cousins during the progress of the war of secession were sometimes amusing and sometimes provoking; but that "the only general" of the British army could, twenty-two years after the war, at leisure and deliberately, put forth statements and opinions like those contained in the Macmillan article, is simply amazing.

Two sentences will suffice: Lord Wolseley asks, "Was ever an army so hopelessly at the mercy of another as that of McClellan when he began his retreat to Harrison's Landing after the seven days' fighting around Richmond? What commander could wish to have his foe in a 'tighter place' than Burnside was in after his disastrous attack upon Lee at Fredericksburg?"

What does the first sentence quoted mean? Does Lord Wolseley suppose that the retreat to Harrison's Landing began after the seven days' fighting? That retreat was accomplished during the seven days' fighting; that retreat was the seven days' fighting. So much for Lord Wolseley's conception of the situation. His criticism is equally worthless. Lee had all he could do to dislodge McClellan from his position in front of Richmond and make his retreat to the James necessary. Indeed, he was very fortunate in being able to accomplish so much. His army was on several occasions more at the mercy of McClellan than McClellan's army was on any one occasion at his mercy. Had Porter been properly reinforced on the 27th of June, had Heintzelman supported Sumner on the 29th, the Confederates would have been put in great peril. The nearest Lee came at any time to threatening the existence of the Army of the Potomac was at Glendale, on the 30th. Here a Confederate victory would have involved a serious disaster to McClellan's army, but that victory was not in fact won; the Confederate assaults were thrown off with severe loss, and McClellan's reserves, at the close of the battle, were numerous enough to have taken all the fighting off the hands of the troops that had been engaged. Perhaps Malvern Hill is the point where Lord Wolseley conceives Gen. McClellan's army to have been most hopelessly at the mercy of Gen. Lee!

Lord Wolseley's conception of the situation after the battle of Fredericksburg is not more erroneous, but the error is far less excusable. I venture to assert that the six corps commanders of the Army of the Potomac would have agreed unanimously, on the 14th of December, 1862, to march the best brigade of each division back to Acquia Creek, on the condition that Gen. Lee would attack on that day or any day following. The man who is capable of imagining that the Confederates could have run over the Union army, even after its disastrous repulse at Fredericksburg, is not capable of forming an opinion of value regarding any phase of the American war. In saying this I do not write as a Union soldier, but as an American; and I do not doubt that every Confederate officer present in that battle would agree with me in this.

Lord Wolseley's opinion regarding the movements of the Union and Confederate armies, considered, not strategically but as examples of logistics, is highly amusing. Any one who has read the accounts in the English papers of the efforts of the English military authorities to move a small corps, in light marching order, a few miles, by good roads; give the troops a dinner of cooked food sent down express from London, and get them safely back to camp by nightfall, cannot fail to be entertained by Lord Wolseley's reflections upon the logistics of the American armies, North and South. Repeatedly, during the campaign of '64, bodies of from thirty to fifty thousand men were moved many miles during the night, over the worst of roads, sometimes amid pouring rain, with their hospitals, trains, and artillery, and put into position to deliver or repel an assault by four o'clock in the morning, the whole movement having been ordered and even conceived upon information received after nightfall.

One would not lightly use contemptuous phrases regarding an officer of Lord Wolseley's rank; but the whole body of military criticism contained in this pretentious article cannot be characterized otherwise than as silly, empty, and vain.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN MASSACHUSETTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The "additional statistics" of "E. L." in your number of March 17 are as misleading as those which Sydney Smith once characterized. Granted that only a few thousand women go every year to the trouble and expense of getting themselves registered to vote for school committees in Massachusetts, the wonder is that even so many do this. Under parallel circumstances, not five hundred men would vote. Col. T. W. Higginson recently told the Woman Suffrage Committee of the Legislature that he had taken an active part in many political movements, but that all his political duties during the entire year did not give him so much trouble as trying to keep his wife's name on the Cambridge voting list, and that he had failed in doing so after all. Every one knows that the nomination of school committee is a minor part of the general system of municipal suffrage, and is shaped and determined in the party caucuses, from which women are excluded. The nominees of these caucuses are afterwards elected on a general party ticket, with no regard whatever to their respective merits. The 1,200 women voters of Boston have more than once brought forward the names of first-class men who have subsequently been taken up by the Democratic party and elected. No woman has ever yet been elected upon the Boston School Board upon a general ticket, unless she has first received the Democratic nomination, and no woman has ever failed of an election when she has been thus nominated. Miss Abby W. May, Miss Lucia Peabody, and Mrs. Emily A. Fifield have been thus chosen, and have done admirable service. But these ladies have been left off because they were too independent to do the behests of party managers, because politicians wanted their places, and because they were not Democratic voters. They have always received the undivided support of all, or almost all, the women voters.

But the important and encouraging fact connected with the school committee vote in Massachusetts is its quality. The few thousand women who have annually taken the trouble to get their names registered have done so solely from public spirit, and have been without exception women of superior intelligence and character. They have for ever refuted the prediction that "only bad women will vote." No sane man or woman will claim that the women have done harm or have lowered the standard of politics, either as voters or as school officers. On the contrary, it will be admitted that the more such voters the better. But in order to have more, greater inducement must be offered. Full municipal suffrage, on the same terms as men, as just granted in Kansas, will be the only fair test. When this is granted in Massachusetts, women will vote in large numbers; never till then.

Meanwhile, more than one hundred women are serving on school committees throughout the State—more than five times as many as before women voted. And wherever, as in Woburn, any attempt is made to control the public schools in sectarian interests, women will register and vote. In that town more than six hundred women have done so for several years past, and have saved the schools from being thus perverted.

A few years ago we had a special election in Boston for male citizens on the question whether a system of public parks should be inaugurated. It was far more likely to enlist public interest than the choice of a school committee, since it involved extensive transactions in real estate and an expenditure of millions of dollars. Only one voter in twelve voted for parks; yet the parks carried the day, because only one voter in fourteen took the trouble to vote against them. In the city of Toronto, where school committees have been chosen at a special election, it has just been found necessary to connect it with the general municipal election because only a handful of voters could be induced to come out. (Our School Committee election is a special one, so far as the women are concerned.) Are these facts an argument against manhood suffrage? Not at all. No more are the facts stated by "E. L." an argument against woman suffrage. H. B. B.

DORCHESTER, March 28, 1887.

JOHN COTTON FINALLY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: "Pocomas" has written a second letter in regard to John Cotton, at much greater length and with much more rancor than one would suppose to be altogether necessary in reply to a "column or more of special pleading and irrelevant nonsense," of which he says that I, in my answer to him, have been guilty. But I was glad to see his latest communication, because, however little most that he says bears upon the question really at issue, and however consistently he has misrepresented me throughout, he still does say one thing on account of which his letter is worth answering. The points to be indicated in reply are easily summarized.

(1.) Cases of "Pocomas's" misrepresentation of me. (a.) He says that I "gravely state" that I "consider the three letters at the end of the inscription, viz., S. P. D., to be a misprint for S. T. D." "Pocomas" must pardon the brusqueness of my denial. But I did not. (b.) He says that I said I thought P. M. stands for M. P., Member of Parliament. Again my reply is, I did not.

(2.) I am sorry to see that "Pocomas" does not understand Latin, although he tries to correct me. For he asks where, in the dedication, provided the letters S. P. D. are for S. T. D., Sacrosanctæ Theologiæ Doctor, the verb is to be found. Why, it is a commonplace that the verb is often omitted in a Latin sentence.

(3.) "Pocomas's" discussion of the meaning of the letters P. M., if he will pardon the reference, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, planted by Mr. Gilbert, is interesting, but has nothing to do with the case. Whether P. M. means 'Pannonius Medicus,' or 'Post Master,' or 'afternoon,' really makes no difference whatever in regard to the question as to which John Cotton is meant. This device of treating the irrelevant as the relevant is a form of the argumentum ad hominem which is very serviceable at times, but does not apply here.

(4.) But "Pocomas," as I said, does say one thing which makes his letter really worth answering. He interprets D.D. as dignissimo domino. This, no doubt, is very plausible. But then his sentence would be left without a verb; and this is a state of things which, as pointed out under 2, he cannot allow at all. Now, as Jeffrey said, "This will never do." From a laudable desire to prove his point, he says that D.D. means dignissimo domino, but forgets that a rule which he has previously laid down should prevent such an interpretation on his part. The real reason for his choice of this interpretation thus clearly appears. He must retreat either to the interpretation dono dedit or to dedicavit. Better information about verbs in Latin sentences would have left open to him, as it does to everybody, not only the last-cited interpretations, but the dignissimo domino besides. Dominus, however, as I showed in my letter to the Advertiser, was a title frequently given to clergymen. And thus, even if "Pocomas's" suggestion (which he himself has no right to accept) be accepted, it leaves the case about the same as before. And arguments which, by the way, "Pocomas" conveniently ignored, make it still stronger.

I should not have ventured before your readers thus to state my case had I not been so strangely misrepresented, and had I formerly taken the opportunity of replying to my critic through your columns. Readers of my first reply to "Pocomas" and his to me must feel, I fear, that he slashes and thrusts with his sword in a manner not altogether in harmony with the generally accepted rules of polite warfare. Nor are duels fought nowadays with one contestant behind the arras.

"'Pocomas,'" it seems to me, "doth protest too much."—Very respectfully,

W. M. Fullerton.

[We must close this controversy here, but not without expressing our amazement that the statements a and b are charged against "Pocomas" as "misrepresentations."—Ed. Nation.]

MEANS AND ENDS.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In an analysis of our political systems and methods a prominent place would have to be given to the investigating committee. It is a carefully adjusted arrangement by which inquiry is kept at a certain distance behind the facts without any danger of overtaking them. Whenever any exceptional public scandal or manifestation of helplessness comes to light, Congress, or the State Legislature, or the City Council appoints a committee to investigate it. This is generally a partisan body, determined in advance to declare the persons or things investigated either absolutely innocent or inexcusably criminal. If it does investigate at all, it does so by a process so cumbrous and tedious that the public and all concerned become utterly indifferent to the result; and lastly, as it has no punitive power, it can only report its discoveries to the body which created it, and which, being tender-hearted towards offenders (generally for sound reasons), or too little interested in administration to care about reforming it, may be said literally never to take any action in consequence. Hardly anybody, therefore, reads in his newspaper of the appointment of an investigating committee without a smile of contempt.

This cannot be said, however, of Senator Cockrell of Missouri, who, according to the statement of a reporter, proposes to pass the next three months in Washington in getting up information for the select committee of the Senate which is to meet on June 20, and to try and find out "whether it is the Administration or Congress that is responsible for the arrears of work and for the slowness with which the work of the Government is performed." I will venture to offer to the Senator a bit of prediction which it may be interesting to verify. He and the Committee will probably do a great deal of hard work and will gather together a mass of information which they will regard as of the highest practical value, and which will be embodied in a report to the Senate. It will be ordered to be printed, and that is the last word that any mortal on earth will ever hear of it, so that, in fact, the time and labor and expense of the Committee might just as well have been spared. If it is asked why this is so confidently predicted, I will simply refer to the Senate Document Room as a catacomb of similar reports upon every conceivable subject from the beginning of the Government, of which, if it is too much to say that not one was ever acted upon, yet the percentage is so small as hardly to affect the result.

The reason of existence of the Committee, as stated at length by the Senator, is the fact that Congress makes its appropriations and gives its orders without any reference to the condition or organization of the departments, or, in general, to the practicability of carrying them out; while, for precisely that reason, the departments are staggering in hopeless confusion. If Senator Cockrell really wishes to see a practical reform in this respect, there is one way in which he can promote it, and that is by bringing the departments and Congress into public contact; by letting investigation and reform proceed side by side; by letting the heads of departments publicly state, and members of Congress publicly inquire, what changes and modifications legislation and administration may respectively need; in short, by vigorously supporting the Senate report of February 4, 1881, in favor of allowing the Cabinet officers seats, without votes, in both houses, with the right of sharing in debate and the duty of answering questions.

I observe that your correspondent, "R. F.," is distressed in mind at the sectionalism of Congress, and proposes that fifteen members at large from either party should be elected to represent the whole country. May I invite him to the wholesome process of thinking out what his idea involves? In the first place, there is a special constitutional amendment—no slight undertaking, and therefore not to be entered upon without a clear idea of how it would work. Then the members at large must come from somewhere, and therefore be just as local in feeling as any other members; they would have no more power over and no more responsibility for administration than any other members; their presence would in no wise affect the secret-committee system, which is the real source of trouble. As a matter of experience, moreover, "R. F." will find, if he will take the trouble to inquire, that in several cases of city and, I am inclined to think, in some of State governments, this very expedient has been tried of having members at large as a remedy for sectionalism, and always with complete failure.

I venture to suggest to him that there is a much more simple and effective machinery ready at hand for the same end. The President, and, through him, the Cabinet, do represent the whole country. Being intrusted with, and therefore responsible for, the national administration, they have a much greater interest in the success of that than in favoring any locality. By giving to the Cabinet officers a public share in the discussion of legislation, order and system would be obtained, and business brought out of the committee-rooms into public view, and thus the power of the nation be brought to bear against local and private interest. May I not hope to enlist "R. F." among the rapidly multiplying recruits in support of this as a real and practical remedy for the evil which we both deplore? G. B.

A WORKINGMAN'S THOUGHTS ON LABOR.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As a workingman I have been amused at the many theories put forward as the cause and the remedy for the present unsatisfactory social condition of the working classes. The most common remedy for the troubles of the workman is that he must rise above it, and thus not be a workman. But, as far as can be seen, there will always be a working class; so that this remedy will not do away with the troubles of a class, but only of the individual. What the workingman wants is steady employment, with reasonable freedom of thought and action, and such pay as will allow him to provide the necessaries of life for himself and family, and do it without excessive toil. In common with most workingmen, I felt that there was something wrong in our present condition, and examined the different theories put forward for our betterment, but have rejected all of them as impracticable. I then looked around me, and thought that if all the energy that is devoted to the production of luxuries was directed to the production of bread and other necessaries, these articles would be so cheap and common that not a single person would want for them. To cheapen the necessaries of life, then, ought to be the aim of the working classes. How can we cheapen them? By taking the tax off of them.

Take that most necessary article, bread; it is indirectly taxed on the farm, on the railroad, and in the elevator, and through every machine and article necessary to its production. It is the same with the cotton shirt of the workingman. It is taxed through the cotton-mill, railroad, and store. Thus we see the wheat that is so cheap to the farmer of the West is dear enough to the cotton operative in the East, and the cotton cloth, so cheap to the operatives, is dear enough to the farmer of the West. In this manner taxes hinder the natural working of exchange, and throw many out of employment by hindering profitable production.

We ought to do away with the taxes on the machinery of production, and make the rule that when a man invests a dollar in production, such money cannot be taxed. It is not the owner of the cotton-mill that pays the tax, but the person that consumes the cotton cloth. Taxes could be raised by dues on consumption, with the heaviest taxes on the greatest and most harmful luxuries. It seems to me that, with such a system of government, a single worthy workingman would not want for the necessaries while a single acre of land remained uncultivated or luxuries were indulged in by any class of the community.

Much has been done in the past by improving the intelligence and morals of the working class, but it can be easily seen that a man with a family living on nine dollars a week must suffer even if he has the intelligence of a statesman, the economy of a miser, and the morals of a saint. A country can only support so many people; if a large part of its energy is directed to the support of bread-wasting luxuries, the lower classes of that people must suffer for the necessaries. Then let us not tax capital, the tool of labor, or the necessaries of life, while there is a single luxury on which the tax can be saddled.—Yours,

E. A.

THE WEST VIRGINIA SENATOR.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In West Virginia, after the Legislature failed to elect a United States Senator, the Governor appointed Mr. Lucas. An extra session of the Legislature has been ordered, but the design seems to be to prevent an election of Senator. Is the Democratic Executive of that State conscious of the very grave difficulties in the way of admitting to his seat an appointee selected under such circumstances? Or will the Democratic majority take the chance of having their State represented by a single Senator? Without considering whether a vacancy presupposes an incumbency, the practice of the Senate has, it seems to me, absolutely determined that the power of the Governor to appoint does not arise if a Legislature qualified to elect fails or refuses to elect.

The question arises upon the proper construction of the third section of the first article of the Constitution, which is: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislatures thereof for six years." Then, after providing for classification and expiration so as to elect one-third every second year, this section proceeds: "And if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Whatever may have been the practice of the Senate upon this question before 1825, it has been uniformly held since the Lanman case that a failure by the Legislature to make a choice of a Senator does not constitute the contingency in which the Governor may appoint a Senator. In other words, the Senate, in 1825, upon full consideration, deliberately determined that it was not within the constitutional power of a Governor to fill a seat for a full term by appointment; or, as the late Senator David Davis put it, in April, 1879, upon the question of admitting Mr. Bell of New Hampshire, the true interpretation of this section of the Constitution is: When the Legislature has an opportunity of providing a Senator and fails, the Governor cannot appoint.

This construction has been accepted by public men of all parties, and had been the uniform rule down to the year 1879, when, by the admission of Mr. Charles H. Bell of New Hampshire, it is claimed by some that the rule in the Lanman case was changed. This contention is not well founded, as a careful examination of the Bell case will at once make clear. Upon the admission of Mr. Bell the Senate divided, and not upon party lines, Mr. Bayard and Mr. Jones voting with the majority, and Mr. Carpenter, Mr. Conkling, and the present President of the Senate, voting with the minority. There were, of course, two reports. The minority report, signed by Senators Hoar, Angus Cameron, and Ingalls, favored the admission and was finally adopted.

We presume that certain parts of this report, taken along with the contention of Senator Carpenter and others who opposed Mr. Bell's admission—that the New Hampshire Legislature which declined to elect had the constitutional power to elect—furnish ground for the claim that the Senate's action in this case reversed the rule established in 1825.

The minority report does say: "A vacancy happens and only happens when the Legislature fails to make due election, or the person chosen declines the appointment, or where the office once filled is vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise." Further on, however, and in explanation of the foregoing, the minority says: "Whether it so happens that the person once chosen is unable to remain in office, or it so happens that the Legislature cannot meet and choose, the contingency of a vacancy in the office has occurred."

Here was the exact point upon which the admission of Mr. Bell turned. The majority of the Senate thought, with the minority of the Elections Committee, that the Legislature of New Hampshire, which had failed to elect, did not have the constitutional power to elect, and therefore they distinguished that case from the Lanman case.

Mr. Bell was appointed under these circumstances: Mr. Wadleigh's term as Senator from New Hampshire was to expire on the 3d of March, 1879. A Legislature chosen in 1878 was to have its first session in June, 1879. By reason of a change in the Constitution of New Hampshire, there was in that State a Legislature whose term of office began in June, 1878, to terminate in May, 1879, which Legislature was in recess when Mr. Wadleigh's term expired. The Legislature last chosen before the expiration of a Senatorial term must elect a successor—by United States statute regulating the manner of election. On the 13th of March, 1879, the Governor appointed Mr. Bell. The minority of the Committee claimed that the old Legislature could not, for the statute just referred to, elect, because the new body was the one last chosen, and that this one could not elect because it had no authority, as a Legislature, under the State Constitution, until June, 1879.

It readily appears, therefore, that this action of the Senate in admitting Mr. Bell could not, by any fair rule of construction, be regarded as reversing the rule in the Lanman case. In fact, from the argument of the Senators who favored the admission of Mr. Bell, it is plain that they recognized the rule in the Lanman case as valid, subsisting, and binding. Mr. Rollins, arguing for the minority report, said:

"As we understand the Lanman case, Mr. Bell's application here does not conflict with it at all. It may be summed up in a few words: In that case a Legislature competent to elect had met and failed to elect a Senator. In this case no Legislature met prior to this appointment that was competent to elect. The Senate of the United States has so decided." (Globe, April 7, 1879.)

Further on in the argument Mr. Garland referred to an old case—the Kensey Johns case from Delaware—where a vacancy occurred by resignation in September of one year, then in January following a Legislature met and adjourned without choosing a successor in March, and, after adjournment, the Governor appointed, but the appointee was denied admission by a vote of 20 to 7. Thereupon Senator Angus Cameron, one of the minority, interrupting the speaker, said that the minority agreed to the principle enunciated in the Kensey Johns case, explicitly admitting the doctrine that if the Legislature had an opportunity to elect and failed, the Governor had no constitutional power to appoint.

In fine, all through the discussion on the admission of Mr. Bell, it was conceded on all hands that the authority of the Lanman case was decisive upon any case presenting a like state of facts.

"BLIZZARD."

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The third part of the Philological Society's Dictionary, just received, devotes considerable space to the word blizzard, but omits all reference to an early, perhaps the earliest, meaning. Along the Atlantic Coast, among the gunners who often hunt in parties stationed near together behind blinds, waiting for the flocks of migratory birds, the word blizzard means a general discharge of all the guns, nearly but not quite together—a rattling volley, differing from a broadside in not being quite simultaneous. This use of the word is familiar to every 'longshore man from Sandy Hook to Currituck, and goes back at least forty years, as my own memory attests. This is undoubtedly the sense in which Col. Crockett used the word in the passage which the editors of the New Dictionary find so puzzling: "A gentleman at dinner asked me for a toast, and, supposing he meant to have some fun at my expense, I concluded to go ahead and give him and his likes a blizzard."

The 'longshore men of forty years ago were all sailors, and many of them had served in the navy. That they may have learned the word there is rendered probable by the rather notable accuracy with which they always distinguished between a blizzard and a broadside. This points to a nautical origin of the word, though it made no progress in general use till it struck the Western imagination as a term for that convulsion of the elements for which "snow-storm," with whatever descriptive epithet, was no adequate name, and the keen ear of the newspaper reporter caught it and gave it currency as "reportorial" English.

Blizzards and broadsides have gone out of fashion in the navy, together with seventy-four-gun frigates, but there may be still an old salt among your readers who passed his early days in a three-decker, who may be able to give us more light on the early use of the word.

Philadelphia, March 24, 1887.

[Our readers may be referred to the discussion of this subject, at the time the new sense of blizzard came into vogue (in the winter of 1880 81), in the Nation, vol. xxxii, pp. 184, 208, 220, 260. The weight of evidence was in favor of the explanation given above, and the most plausible etymology connected blizzard with blaze (away). Bartlett, in his 'Dictionary of Americanisms,' cited Crockett as above, and rendered blizzard by 'poser,' but he was evidently drawing on his inner consciousness.—Ed. Nation.]

ANGLO-SAXON PIRATING.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have just seen an English despatch about Mr. Ruskin's copyright profits, in which it is said that "America lives on its pirated editions." It is usual for Englishmen thus to express themselves on this subject. Does it not seem to you that it is time that the fact should be recognized in England that there is not an American author worth "pirating" whose works are not reprinted by English publishers, and that the books are not seldom altered in very disagreeable ways from the form given them by their writers?

Whatever you may think, it seems to me that Englishmen should be ashamed of making such disingenuous remarks about Americans.

TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your correspondents have given a number of amusing instances of the transformation of surnames; the last being the degradation of Papillon into Mr. Fly. Some of the most singular ones have occurred among our mixed and cosmopolitan population. A man's name often changes as he moves from the French quarter, below Canal Street, to the American quarter, above Canal Street.

Some years ago a German took up his abode in the French quarter whose name was Fritz Feuerstein. His Gallic neighbors could not frame their tongue to pronounce it aright, so they called him Monsieur Pierre-de-Feu, and this soon degenerated into simple Monsieur Pierre. Moving into the American side, he became Mr. Stone. Again he moved into the French quarter and sought to reëstablish his old name of Feuerstein, and they reëstablished the name of Pierre-de-Feu, which, on a residence among Americans, became Mr. Flint. Another residence among the creoles, in a new neighborhood, produced Monsieur Pierre-de-Fusil, and, going in advanced age to end his days above Canal Street among the Americans of English parentage, his name became Peter Gun.—Very respectfully, B. R. Forman.

Notes.

A versatile writer and scholar, Prof. Josiah Royce of Harvard, has written a novel of Californian life, called 'The Feud of Oakfield Creek,' to be published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. They also announce 'Daffodils,' poems by Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney; 'A Club of One: Passages from the Note-Book of a Man who might have been Sociable'; and 'His Star in the East, a Study in the Early Aryan Religions,' by the Rev. Leighton Parks.

Lee & Shepard will publish 'Natural Law in the Business World,' by Henry Wood; 'Bridge Disasters in America: Their Cause and the Remedy,' by Prof. George L. Vose, President of the Boston Society of Civil Engineers; 'Later Lyrics,' by Mrs. Julia Ward Howe; 'Buds for the Bridal Wreath,' by the Rev. Wm. P. Tilden; and 'The Hidden Way across the Threshold,' by Dr. J. C. Street.

'The Church and the Faith: A Philosophical History of the Catholic Church,' by the Rev. W. B. Bolmer, is in the press of E. & J. B. Young & Co.

'These Degenerate Days,' a poem already printed in the daily press by the Rev. M. J. Savage, in response to Mr. Lowell's "Credidimus Jovem Regnare" in the February Atlantic, will be made into a 16mo volume, and issued by Geo. H. Ellis.

D. C. Heath & Co. promise for May 1 'The Earth in Space: a Manual of Astronomical Geography,' by Edward P. Jackson.

'The Volunteer Soldier in America,' a posthumous work of the late Gen. Logan, is to be published by subscription by R. S. Peale & Co., Chicago. It will contain a biographical memoir.

Mr. H. Morse Stephen's 'History of the French Revolution,' lately reviewed by us on the appearance of the first volume, is well advanced. The second volume is in the press, and the third ready to be brought out.

It must suffice at present that we acknowledge receipt of Part 3 of the Philological Society's 'New English Dictionary' (Macmillan). For reasons already given, it offers unusual interest to students of the origin and development of the language, and a careful examination must precede our customary report upon the progress of this enduring work. The closing word is Bozzom.

Macmillan & Co. send us the twenty-fourth issue of their 'Statesman's Year-book,' for 1887. On page 668 one will find that the editor has taken cognizance of the recent change in the law of the Presidential succession. His list of "non-official publications" concerning this country would bear freshening. He has not kept pace with Von Holst's histories. McPherson's annual 'Hand-book of Politics' is ignored. Woodrow Wilson's 'Congressional Government' deserves mention, and so eminently does Schouler's 'History of the United States.' Among the official publications, Dr. Wharton's new 'Digest of the International Law of the United States' should hereafter be included.

Macmillan & Co. have published in their "Foreign School Classics" an edition of the first part of "Faust," edited by Jane Lee, lecturer in German literature, Newnham College, Cambridge. There is no satisfactory edition of "Faust" with English notes presenting the highest and most recent criticism, and this work has unusual merits, yet is open to one serious criticism. It is, in the main, a translation and skilful adaptation of Schröer's German edition of "Faust," without any proper recognition of the sources from which the notes have been derived. Many of the comments are exact translations from Schröer, containing not only his explanations, but his philological comments and numerous citations and comparisons from other German authors. It is true that Von Loeper and Düntzer are laid under contribution, and at the end of the notes there is a list of books which the author "has used in preparing this edition;" but such acknowledgment is inadequate. There are introductory chapters on Goethe's life, the "Faust" legend, and Goethe's "Faust," and an appendix containing an outline of the second part.

'Cassell's Complete Pocket Guide to Europe' bears a new imprint, but has been long and favorably known as one of the publications of J. R. Osgood & Co. Its handy form, large type, frequent maps (not folding), and flexible binding are its meritorious points. A table of climatic health resorts and a special travellers' telegraphic code are the chief original features of the contents. On p. 484 the word "Osgood's" has perhaps been overlooked. Under Vienna one would have expected mention of the Grand Hotel.

Barrow's 'Sermons on Evil-Speaking,' a third instalment of Pepys's Diary, and Shakspere's "Tempest," are the latest continuations of Morley's "National Library" (Cassell).

The 'Shelley Primer,' by H. S. Salt (London: Reeves & Turner), aims to supply in a small space the facts most necessary to the study of the poet's works. It consists of a very slight biographical sketch, an abstract of Shelley's opinions, an account of the works severally and of the circumstances of their composition, and some other matter. It is not a conspicuous success. There are loose statements here and there in regard to facts, and the analysis of the poems and the opinions of Shelley are lacking in insight and comprehensiveness. It would certainly have been much better to have said nothing of his "influence in literature and thought" than to have said so little so aimlessly. The principal value of the Primer consists in its bringing together, in a way convenient for quick reference, the facts that belong to each work taken by itself.

Mr. Austin Dobson's 'At the Sign of the Lyre' appeared in America nearly a year before it was published in London, and so did Mr. Lang's 'Books and Bookmen,' just published in London by Longmans, Green & Co. Mr. Lang has followed Mr. Dobson's example in not reprinting in England all the pieces which appeared in the American edition. The papers on "Book-Binding" and "Bookmen at Rome" give place to essays on "Lady Book-Lovers" and "Old French Title-Pages"—a delightful essay with rubricated facsimiles. In general, however, the printing of the English edition is inferior to that of the American (done by the Riverside Press).

A good idea of the nature and extent of the facilities offered for research at the Physiological Laboratory of the Harvard Medical School may be gained from the octavo volume ("for private circulation") of over 200 pages, with many illustrations, embracing twenty-two papers by eight individuals. Several are wholly or in part the direct product of the Professor of Physiology, Dr. H. P. Bowditch, whose admirable paper, "What is Nerve Force?" the vice-presidential address in the Biological Section of the American Association for Advancement of Science last summer, is included.

The Proceedings of the Department of Superintendence of the National Educational Association in Washington a year ago (February 23-26, 1886) have but just been published in Circular No. 2, 1886, of the Bureau of Education. The leading papers of interest were on mixed education of the races, with a special bearing against the Chinese; on negro education; and on the Blair Bill, to which the papers read were decidedly favorable—but happily without insuring its success.

More profitable, in our opinion, than anything in the foregoing document, is a paper read by President Dreher of Roanoke College, Va., before the Department of Higher Instruction of the National Educational Association at Topeka, Kan., on July 16, 1886—also only recently put in print. Its title was "Colleges North and Colleges South." The author, a Southern man, frankly considers the educational defects of his section, as shown by its multiplicity of "universities" and "colleges," out of all proportion to population and material resources; the confusion of courses and standards, as well as of names; the absurd degree-giving; the competition of institutions really of different grades; the frequent attempt to maintain a State university, with all the needful preparatory schools, following an occasional Northern example, etc., etc. Incidentally, President Dreher argues that the scheme of instruction of the University of Virginia—the school-and-lecture system—has furnished an unfortunate model to other institutions at the South. As this system has lately been under discussion in these columns, we may refer our readers to Prof. Garnett's exposition of it in the Andover Review for April, 1886—one of the papers called out by Prof. Palmer's advocacy of the Harvard elective system.

The March Academy (Syracuse, N. Y.) prints, with editorial comment, Prof. Poland's report in January to the New England Association of Colleges and Preparatory Schools, on behalf of the still youthful "Commission of Colleges in New England on Admission Examinations." This body has been created experimentally to bring about uniformity of preparation and requirements for admission to college—uniformity, that is, "in the minimum requirement," as Mr. Bacon points out. Its functions are purely advisory, and not binding, and its achievements will be watched with curiosity and no little interest and hopefulness.

The October-December number of the American Journal of Archæology closes the second volume. The opening paper, on some unpublished white lekythoi from Attica, is accompanied by plates. Dr. Alfred Emerson follows with a first article on the "Portraiture of Alexander the Great," which does not reach the critical and comparative stage. Prof. Frothingham's "Notes on Christian Mosaics" relate this time to the portico of the Lateran Basilica. The other departments of the Journal are worthily filled, as usual.

In the April number of the Magazine of American History are concluded two series of papers of much interest—one, by Charles H. Peck, on John Van Buren; the other, by Benjamin E. Martin, on the early American press, called in this final instalment "Transition Period of the American Press." The latter series has been copiously and effectively illustrated with portraits and facsimiles, as (in the present instance) in the case of Wm. Coleman, founder of the New York Evening Post.

Prof. A. S. Packard, founder of the American Naturalist, has retired from the management of this journal in favor of Dr. J. S. Kingsley, of Malden, Mass. Prof J. H. Comstock, of Cornell, will have charge of the department of Entomology.

Architects will welcome another illustrated paper on the "Half-Timber Houses in the Weald of Kent and Neighborhood," by Reginald T. Blomfield, in the Portfolio for March (Macmillan). Mr. Walter Armstrong begins a series, also illustrated, on "Scottish Painters." The two etchings of the number are the grand staircase in Burgos Cathedral, and "The Rising Sun" of Claude copied in photogravure.

The poverty of a certain branch of decorative art in this country may fairly be inferred from the fact that the Art Amateur called in 134 designs for a new cover, and found 10 worthy of honorable mention, but none worthy of the premium ($100).

Mr. Sidney S. Rider's Book Notes (Providence), having reached the end of its fourth volume with the issue of March 28, is discontinued, or at least suspended indefinitely. We copy this announcement with regret, for the little sheet, though a bookseller's advertising medium, has been more than that: it has been an independent organ of literary and historical criticism well worthy of the index with which it has been carefully provided. Mr. Rider has spoken his mind with equal and particularly refreshing frankness on the subject of the tariff, of which he is a hearty hater, and is consequently tabooed as much as if he were a free-trade resident of Philadelphia. In his valedictory he properly recognizes the recent beneficent transformation of the Providence Journal—which, indeed, partly takes away the occupation of the Book Notes.

The opening article in the Antiquary for March, "The Public Crosses of Nottingham," is of importance as illustrating the municipal vandalism which has destroyed, or allowed to perish, so many relics of antiquity. The series on "London Theatres" reaches No. 6, viz.: "The Cockpit, Drury Lane," "a playhouse in touch with the present time." As it is "one in history with the Globe, the idea of continuity becomes startling. Walking beneath the colonnade of Drury Lane Theatre to-day, we feel ourselves in contact with the beginning of London theatres." Of "Celebrated Birthplaces" we have that of Sir Isaac Newton at Woolsthorpe, with two woodcuts. Of considerable interest is "Beginners in Business, 1607," giving copious extracts from 'The Merchant's Avizo,' a book designed to give assistance and direction to youthful adventurers. Under the innocent-sounding title, "The First Mayor of London," Mr. J. H. Round continues his assaults upon Mr. Freeman's accuracy—Mr. Freeman having lent the authority of his name to the book assailed, Loftie's 'London.' This book, it seems, makes out a genealogy for the famous Henry Fitz Ailwin which Mr. Round shows to be impossible and incredible, representing him (who died in 1212) to have been the grandson of the Portreeve Leofstan in the time of Edward the Confessor.

The greater part of the March Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society is taken up with Mr. H. J. Makinder's paper "On the Scope and Methods of Geography," with the discussion which followed it. The speaker began by combating the view that physical and political geography are separate subjects, to be studied by different methods, the one an appendix of geology, the other of history. He defined geography as the "science of distribution," which concerns itself not merely with the facts, but with the causes and connections of the various distributions. Studied after this method, which he illustrated by showing how geological and meteorological causes were all-important factors in accounting for the greatness of London, as well as for the fact that Delhi was the capital of old and Calcutta of New India, geography would prove a bridge across the abyss which separates the natural sciences and humanity, and would tend to restore the equilibrium to our culture. In the discussion which followed, some of the most eminent geographers in England took part, among others, Sir Frederic Goldsmid, Messrs. Francis Galton, Douglas W. Freshfield, and Prof. H. G. Seeley. The most lucid speech, however, was that of Mr. James Bryce, who heartily supported the position taken in the paper. With great felicity of expression he sketched a course of study which he contended would not only develop a philosophical habit of mind and cultivate the imagination, but would add vastly to the delight and interest with which men would travel in different parts of the world. There was, with many slight differences of detail and definition, a general unanimity in all the speakers, and it is evident that in England geography will be taught henceforth largely after the new method. Mr. J. T. Last contributes an account of his recent journey to Angoni land to the south of Lake Nyassa, which, with the usual notes, completes the number.

Westermann & Co. send us two more numbers of the abridged 'Allgemeine Weltgeschichte,' viz.: 66–67, 68–69. Dr. Philippson has the floor, describing the counter-Reformation in Middle and Eastern Europe. The illustrations are exceptionally curious and instructive, embracing an old print showing the unfinished St. Peter's, another of the siege of Venice by the Turks in 1529, the death-warrant of Mary Queen of Scots signed by Elizabeth, a document of Martin Luther's in his own hand, many portraits, etc., etc. From the same firm we have Nos. 61–72 of the Allgemeine Naturkunde, with man still the theme of Dr. Johannes Ranke, to the end of his second volume. Existing savage and barbarous races are fully discussed and beautifully illustrated from the most authentic sources (mainly photographic), and prehistoric man is likewise set forth in all the manifestations of utensils, weapons, structures, and artistic achievement which have survived to us.

The fifth and sixth volumes, in one, of Pierre Margry's 'Mémoires et Documents pour servir à l'histoire des origines françaises des pays d'outremer' have just appeared (Paris: Maisonneuve; New York: Christern). It deals with the first chain of posts from the Great Lakes to the Gulf (1683–1725).

A volume which may be read by Americans with some interest has just been published under the title, 'De Paris au Niagara: journal de voyage d'une délégation' (Paris: Duprat; Boston: Schoenhof). It is a collection of the articles on the United States sent by M. Charles Bigot to the Revue Bleue at the time of the dedication of the Bartholdi statue. The journal is readable, and interesting as being the impressions of an intelligent foreigner upon this country. With a few exceptions of little consequence, it is unusually accurate, perhaps because the writer wisely confined himself to the surface of things; but that surface is very fairly described, without picturesqueness or suggestiveness, indeed, either in style or thought, but always with good-nature and liveliness, and with a great readiness to admire all that was new.

Among recent announcements of French books now in preparation are: 'Nos hommes d'état,' by Jules Simon, and 'Discours et Conférances,' by Ernest Renan.

Among the latest French school-books published in Paris is Franklin's 'Autobiography' (in English), with a biographical sketch, an analysis, and notes in French by M. P. Fiévet (Paris: Hachette; New York: F. W. Christern). We have already noted the appearance of an annotated selection from Longfellow's poems as a French school-book.

The veteran lexicographer, Dr. Daniel Sanders, begins on April 1 the issue of a monthly Zeitschrift für Deutsche Sprache, whose aim will be to promote a deeper knowledge and love of the mother tongue. The place of publication is Hamburg (J. F. Richter).

As the lectures of the Concord School of Philosophy for the current year will be concerned with "Aristotle and His Philosophy in Its Relation to Modern Thought," Mr. Thomas Davidson proposes to direct a course partly preparatory and partly supplementary at St. Cloud, Orange Mountain, N. J., during three weeks from June 20. The region is delightful for residence at that season, and easily accessible daily from New York.

—There will be a natural misgiving in the minds of some persons on turning to the Thackeray correspondence in the April Scribner's. One remembers the great novelist's express prohibition forbidding the admittance of the public to his private life, and also the disappointment that has been brought in late years by breaking such seals. But these letters soon dispel the first inevitable doubt. They are a literary treasure. As one reads, it seems as if Thackeray had come to life again and were delighting us with a new work from his hand. Here is the familiar wit and tenderness and simplicity, the knowledge of our preposterous human nature and the eye for its worldly manifestations, and the author himself in his most intimate and charming moods, reflecting and brightening the inconstant comedy of the scenes that interested him. The letters are addressed to the Brookfields, a family with whom he was on the closest terms of friendship. The first block of them dates from 1847 to 1849; they are written from his lodgings, the club, or on journeys to Spa and Paris, or from the country. They are long, familiar letters, for the most part, and the drawings with which he illustrated them bring them very close to the reader. They are full of references to his own works and to the characters which had most hold on his imagination. There is no space to quote from them, and there is too much that would call for quotation. The original of Amelia is said to be composite: "You know, you are only a piece of Amelia: my mother is another half; my poor little wife—y est pour beaucoup." But the charm is not in any such information, or in any of the sayings, the scenes depicted so sharply and quickly, or the personal adventures, but is diffused through the whole. There is not a word that one would wish unpublished. It is like meeting an old friend after many years and finding him unchanged. One cannot but be sensible how his reality and heart dwarf the fiction of the later and less modest day. If the series continues as it has begun, English literature has a new classic. The close of Mr. Washburne's papers on the Commune has a most interesting account of the last days of the Archbishop of Paris and his murder.

—Harper's takes up the subject of Chattanooga in the series of papers upon American cities. The "New South" naturally enters into the story, but it does not monopolize it, as one might expect. The "Gateway of the Alleghanies" has a history reaching far back of the last decade, and is now in the hands of the third great race that has possessed it. The writer touches on the prehistoric narrative, and devotes a good deal of space to John Sevier and Joseph Brown, who conducted the long, fierce struggle with the Chickamaugas, and to the first settlement. The war period, slightly described, and the planting of the mining and manufacturing interests, under the lead of Gen. Wilder, and the consequent extraordinary growth of the city, complete the sketch. It is a most striking chapter of American development. The remarkable differences observable in the history of the founding of our American cities, too commonly believed to be one self same and twice-told story, make a most instructive feature of these most useful papers. Another monograph of great interest is Theodore Child's comprehensive summary of all things relating to the Comédie-Française—its history, government, theatre arrangements, etc. Ralph Meeker's travel-sketch of southern Russia is noticeable for the kindlier and more favorable view it takes of the civilization, or at least of the inhabitants, in that region, whose "barbarism" he declares overstated. Mr. Warner begins a series of Mexican notes in a vein that does not promise any flattery. He likens the metaphorical "atmosphere" to that of Egypt, which he says is "lying." He warns us against the people in very comprehensive terms: "whoever makes a treaty with them is likely to be confused by the result; whoever invests money in Mexico, either in public works or in private enterprise, does so at his risk," etc. Evidently, autocracy masking as a "Republic" has no charms for him.

—Among the many curious manufactured Greek sentences to be found in Dr. Goodell's 'The Greek in English' (Henry Holt & Co.), we find the following: "The fellow wants to be wise and to write books." Let us acquit Dr. Goodell in advance of any such selfish intention. His object is to make the Greek element in English more living than it is. Other manuals, such as the old 'Scholar's Companion,' had tried before to arrange the Greek elements in English around certain centres, but Dr. Goodell thinks that "the words in their Greek form, and with some fragment of their Greek associations, must become somewhat familiar before one can be sensible of that grasp of their English derivatives which will enable one to use these derivatives fearlessly and correctly"; and to this end he has "grouped the material about a grammatical outline, as thorough memorizing of a few inflections will save time and labor in the end," and will (as he intimates) seduce those who would never have studied Greek at all without the book into further pursuit of the study. Of course the Anglo-Saxon scholar says the same thing, the same thing may be claimed for Latin, for French; and in order to use our highly composite language "fearlessly and correctly" we should have to learn half-a-dozen languages, or at least the outlines of their grammars. For our part, we have never noticed a lack of courage on the part of any English-writing person in the use of words of Greek origin. In fact, greater timidity would have been the more needful lesson; and as the Greek element of English is largely technical, the want of correctness in the application of it is not conspicuous. It is only when people undertake to enrich the English language with new Greek compounds that scholars begin to wince, and Dr. Goodell does not undertake to carry his student up to the point of sensitiveness at which he will be aggrieved or outraged by the performances of scientific men in this line.

—The Greek words in English are, it is true, for the most part dead vocables, and must be so to the vast majority of those who use the language; but let us not deceive ourselves. There is a certain advantage in dead words, if they are only properly mummified and do not breed false analogies. If every Greek word in English, if every Latin word, were alive to us, we should be over-conscious of the mixed metaphors of our every-day writing, and the confusion of images would be worse confounded. Push the words still further back to their etymology, and we are still worse off. The Vulgate "sine offendiculo conscientiam" becomes in English "a conscience void of offence." Put back the color, and we should have what is not void of offence, "viduam offendiculo." So we are somewhat sceptical about the value of bringing back to life the Greek words, real and factitious, that are comfortably embalmed in the English tongue, and we are more than sceptical about the method of making these words alive by constructing a number of Greek sentences—or rather sentences made up of Greek words, in which all that gives Greek its charm is lacking. Whatever good, in spite of its manifold blunders in detail, the well-meant little book may do, we are afraid that the Greek scholar will not take much delight in it, and that the words of the author will be found sadly prophetic: "The Muses do not wish to hear the songs of the she-goat (Chimæra)."

—Prof. Wilhelm Vietor's 'Elemente der Phonetik und Orthoepie des Deutschen, Englischen und Französischen' has reached a second edition in two years. This is striking proof of the extent to which the study of phonetics prevails, and of the depth to which it is pursued; for the book deals with the voice as it appears under a hundred-million magnifying microscope of extra power, to use one of Mr. Weller's expressions, and it accumulates on every point the whole wealth of professorial learning. A book of this kind reminds one of the Middle Ages, the era of the schoolmen, when the way to find out anything was thought to be to read what everybody had written about it. It is much more provoking than satisfactory. You want to study an English sound, but you get lost in a thicket of theories, and begin to doubt whether any two of the theorists are talking about the same sound, and whether any of them really knows the common English sound. A profound old German writes to you for years instructing you how you ought to work your organs to give the precise nuances and colorings to your English o or e: you meet him and find that he cannot make an o or e which any native will recognize. No wonder their books are full of contradictory opinions. We ought to have some mechanical means of recording and repeating vocal sounds, to have reliable, accurate phonographs, so that each scientific phonetist can be sure what sounds others talk about.

—A practical danger to our English speech is emerging from these microscopic records. Each phonetist attempts an exact record of his own unsophisticated pronunciation, of the way he talks in natural conversation when he is not thinking about it. Foreigners naturally, and even Americans, take the records of London phonetists to be standard English. The south English peculiarities which have heretofore figured as "cockneyisms," the dropping of h and r, the obscuring and dropping of unaccented vowels, the insertion of r as in idea(r), and the like abominations are beginning to be caught up, and set forth as the true English, by scientific authorities of Germany and Scandinavia, and taught by their followers in the Continental schools. The personal records of the Londoners, which are of the greatest value to science, are thus perverted to the corruption of standard English, and threaten to separate the English-speaking people into different nations. Dr. Vietor is one of the best of the phonetists. The new edition of his book is in great part rewritten, but only for better form and for the addition of new matter. It is now the most complete and most convenient manual of the kind.

—Paul Féval, who has just died, was one of the most prolific of the writers of novels who followed closely in time, and somewhat in manner, the inexhaustible Alexandre Dumas. He was the author of more than a hundred volumes, of which the most known is 'Madame Gil Blas.' As a playwright he was less successful, although one play, 'Le Bossu,' the dramatization of his story of the same name, was the occasion of a long and bitter quarrel with M. Sardou. In 1876 Paul Féval, nearly ruined by the Ottoman loans, and almost unknown to the new generation of readers, gave himself up fervently to his religious convictions. His conversion was announced and extolled by the Catholic press, avec fracas, says the calm and impartial Journal des Débats. This created a certain stir about his name. He wrote a few more novels in accordance with his new convictions, and published revised and very much changed versions of his former sensational productions. He was for a while president of the Société des Gens de Lettres. He was seventy years old at the time of his death.

SKEATS'S PIERS PLOWMAN.

The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, in three parallel texts, together with Richard the Redeless, by William Langland. Edited from numerous manuscripts, with preface, notes, and a glossary, by the Rev. Walter W. Skeat. Vol. I., Text. Vol. II., Preface, Notes, and Glossary. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. New York: Macmillan. 1886.

FOUR times during the sixteenth century the 'Vision of Piers Plowman' was printed; three times during the present century it has been edited as well as printed. It was theology that first led to the withdrawal of the work from the inaccessibility of manuscript; the same result is now due in large measure to philology. In this fact some may see the difference in the point of view of the two periods. The great religious revolution of the sixteenth century caused the reformers to search diligently for anything and everything in the literature of the past that could be deemed hostile to the creed of the Church of Rome, or that represented the conduct of its members in an unfavorable light. The view that could recognize in Chaucer a religious enthusiast was not likely to let Langland pass unobserved. His work could never have been regarded by any one who read it dispassionately as the production of a man who looked upon the Pope as Antichrist. Still, it did contain many fierce attacks upon abuses then widely prevalent in the various ecclesiastical organizations. It had, in particular, predicted the destruction of the monasteries, and the course of events had given to this lucky forecast almost the character of an inspired prophecy. Besides, the poem throughout was marked by a lofty spiritual tone which verged towards the extreme of asceticism. These things were sufficient for it to find favor with the men who were engaged in the Protestant movement of the sixteenth century.

It was accordingly religious partisanship and not literary appreciation that brought about the first printing of the poem. This was the work of Robert Crowley, and the motive of his undertaking it he avowed plainly in his preface;

"In whose time," he wrote, speaking of the reign of Edward III., "it pleased God to open the eyes of many to see His truth, giving them boldness of heart to open their mouths and cry out against the works of darkness as did John Wycliffe, who also in those days translated the Holy Bible into the English tongue, and this writer, who, in reporting certain visions and dreams that he feigned himself to have dreamed, doth most Christianly instruct the weak and sharply rebuke the obstinate blind. There is no manner of vice that reigneth in any estate of men, which this writer hath not godly, learnedly, and wittily rebuked."

Of the work as then printed, three separate impressions exist, all belonging to this same year, 1550. In 1561 the poem was again printed by Owen Rogers, who also included in the same volume "Piers Plowman's Creed," the production of a later hand.

This sufficed to satisfy the demand. More than two centuries and a half passed by before another edition was called for; or rather it came then without being called. This edition was brought out in 1813 under the superintendence of the Rev. Thomas Dunham Whitaker, better known as a student of local history than of language. The work was got up in magnificent style, so far as print and paper were concerned. At the bottom of each page was a paraphrase explanatory of the text. The text itself was printed in black-letter, which seems to have been long regarded, not as a kind of type, but as a period in the history of the English tongue. The editor did the best he knew how, but unhappily he knew but little. The work, however, which was published by subscription, was too expensive to do either much good or much harm, and, for all that it accomplished, the 'Vision of Piers Plowman' remained even to scholars almost as much a sealed book as ever.

The next edition was that of Thomas Wright, which appeared originally in 1842, and was reprinted with some slight revision in 1856. There is probably no doubt as to the qualifications which the editor possessed for the task: there is most certainly none as to the manner in which it was done. It is time that a little plain speaking was used about Mr. Wright's method of performing his duties as editor to the numerous volumes to which his name is attached in that capacity. A task of such a kind is from its very nature self-imposed, and ought never to be undertaken by any one who does not purpose to discharge it as well as he can. No man ever shirked his duties as an editor more persistently than Wright. He was a man of wide learning, and from previously acquired knowledge he could add a great deal of value to illustrate what he took in hand. There he stopped. He apparently never put himself to the slightest trouble to solve any difficulty which presented itself. If the point was not clear to him at the outset, it was never made any clearer by the attention he paid to its elucidation. As a consequence, he has never said the last word on any subject. He has never edited a work which does not or will not need to be re-edited carefully. The present one was no exception to the general rule.

Prof. Skeat, following the usual custom in England in regard to Mr. Wright, has paid what is termed a generous tribute to his predecessor's labors. If his predecessor had done his duty, his own edition would hardly have been a necessity. But, though giving all honor to Mr. Wright, he has been particularly careful not to follow in his footsteps. It was twenty years ago that Mr. Skeat printed a tract embodying parallel extracts from twenty-nine manuscripts of 'Piers Plowman.' During the intervening years the three versions of the poem with notes and glossary have been published at intervals by the Early English Text Society. In the two volumes before us the results of all the investigations have been brought together and presented in a complete, though sometimes condensed, shape. Mr. Skeat had been the first to demonstrate that the work really existed in three forms, the differences of which were due to the author himself. Here, for convenience of comparison, they are printed side by side. The earliest text, called the Vernon, from the name of the manuscript containing it, is much the shortest. The second text was the one printed by Crowley and edited by Wright, and the third was the one edited by Whitaker. These three occupy the first volume. To them also is added the alliterative poem of 'Richard the Redeless,' attributed by the editor to the author of 'Piers Plowman.' In the first volume, therefore, is to be found everything that can be desired by him who cares for the text alone; for not only are the three versions given, but the important variants of the different manuscripts are recorded at the foot of every page.

The second volume begins with a series of preliminary dissertations, extending to nearly a hundred pages, which are included under the general name of preface. They embrace the discussion of every point connected with the various manuscripts and the various printed editions, with the history of the poem and the life of its author, so far as the facts can be discerned in the twilight of knowledge in which the period itself is enveloped. Then follow several hundred pages of annotation, and these in turn are followed by a complete glossary. It is impossible to speak too highly of the way in which this part of the work has been performed. No point has been overlooked; no unusual word has been neglected; no difficult passage has been passed over in silence, after the established custom of commentators. In a world full of slipshod work, of pretension and non-performance, it is gratifying to come across a task of peculiar difficulty done so honestly and withal so intelligently as has been the editing of this poem.

Not that we always agree with Prof. Skeat's interpretations. The meaning given to by in the note upon the account of the proceedings of the pardoner described in the prologue seems to us wholly unwarranted. The idea of the poet is plainly to represent the objectionable practices complained of as being done by the connivance of the parish priest, and without the sanction or knowledge of the Bishop. The latter grants his permission for the accomplishment of a certain purpose, which is perverted into a purpose of quite different character. So, also, the remark (vol. ii., p. 48) about the distinction between ye and thou being carefully observed is stated altogether too strongly, at least as regards Chaucer and the author of 'William of Palerne.' Still, these are points involving too much detail to be discussed here; nor would the criticism, even if admitted to be just, detract in the slightest from the merits of a work upon which so much wide-reaching and intelligent labor has been expended. Unless new material is discovered, this edition may be regarded as the standard edition for all time.

The poem is worth all the toil and trouble that its production in its present complete form has involved. To put Langland on a level with Chaucer could only be done by him in whom the zeal of the antiquary has overborne the literary sense belonging to the man of cultivated taste. But the 'Vision of Piers Plowman' will always have an attraction of its own to the student of English language and literature, and to the student of English history in all its phases. It is interesting both on account of its external structure and of its internal spirit. It is much the most important of the later representatives of that alliterative system of versification which originally prevailed among all the nations that were united by the bond of common Teutonic kinship. It is much more important still for the view it gives of the social and political condition of the times in which it appeared. A special interest must attach to it, furthermore, on account of the revelation it furnishes of the character of the author. For he is not simply an individual; he is the type of a class. He is a genuine spiritual ancestor of the men who have always been prominent in English social life and political history—the men sometimes of narrow souls but always of intense convictions and lofty motives—the men who love God profoundly and even more profoundly hate his enemies, with whom they are occasionally disposed to confound their own—the men who in all the long series of struggles upon moral questions have never been tempted to sacrifice the right for the sake of the expedient. The 'Vision of Piers Plowman' is an unconscious self-portrayal of a Puritan of the Puritans before the name of Puritan was heard in English history. For the light it casts upon the times and the man, it will always remain a work of peculiar importance; and students of language, of literature, of social problems, of religious thought will all alike be under permanent obligations to Prof. Skeat for the adequate and admirable manner in which he has accomplished a task that has involved the research, and to no small extent the drudgery, of years.

RECENT FRENCH BOOKS.

Among recent French works of literary criticism the place of honor belongs to that of M. Désiré Nisard, the doyen d'âge of French literary critics. His 'Nouveaux mélanges d'histoire et de littérature' (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof) may be the last words of the critic who startled the literary world of France in 1833 by his 'Manifeste contre la littérature facile.' And now, before taking his leave, he sends a few more shafts into the enemy's camp to show that, whatever new theories may have been developed, he still stands on the same classic ground. Especially interesting in this connection is the article, "Les Post-scriptum de Sainte-Beuve," written as it is by the greatest master of classic criticism in judgment on the creator of the modern school, a school diametrically opposed to his own. Sainte-Beuve at various times had had occasion to speak of M. Nisard's method, with high praise for his eminent qualities, but generally with many reservations. In the latest editions of his works he had made still greater restrictions, which might have been developed and expressed with much more precision had not M. Nisard had the good fortune to survive the author of the 'Lundis.' And now M. Nisard, in his best academic style, has the last words, words of stately praise, about his former rival, whom he treats with all the eulogistic condescension of an aristarch who feels that, in spite of modern revolutions in letters, he represents an infallible past of classic culture and correctness. He, therefore, with some complacency, presents the revisions and corrections which are to be found in scattered notes to late editions of the 'Lundis' in regard to Chateaubriand, Lamennais, Béranger, Alfred de Vigny, Lamartine, and others. The irreverential treatment of Boileau in 1826 is sharply contrasted with the "réparation" made in the Causerie of the 27th of December, 1852, with which date M. Nisard opens the period of postscriptums and "recantations." And it is to this last Sainte-Beuve alone that the honor is given of having been a critic "selon la tradition." M. Nisard even says that if, out of all the fragments of literary doctrines scattered throughout the 'Causeries,' there were made a code of æsthetics (a word that Sainte-Beuve never liked), it would be "une esthétique classique libérale." Thus he makes of the founder of historical criticism a Boileau of the nineteenth century. He sees in both the same literary belief, but whereas in the "Legislator of Parnassus" it was fixed and, as it were, closed, in the critic with broadened views and deeper knowledge, it is "ondoyante et ouverte." Boileau would certainly have objected to these words as vigorously as Sainte-Beuve would have rejected the complacency of his rival who thus draws him over into his own school.

The three defects, or, as he mitigates his expression with a certain magnanimity of malicious kindliness, "qualités à contre-temps," which M. Nisard finds in Sainte-Beuve's earlier criticisms are an overflow of enthusiasm; a poetic turn of mind; a heart too prompt to admire those whom he had to judge. Certainly the first and third of these are not the defects of the younger generation of critics of whom MM. Brunetière and Jules Lemaitre are the most in view. In the third volume of the series entitled "Histoire et Littérature" (Paris: Calmann Lévy; Boston: Schoenhof) M. Brunetière exhibits the same unrelenting spirit towards certain tendencies of the literature of the Third Republic to which he gave expression in his five previous volumes of collected essays. There are, however, notably in the long articles on the works of MM. Taine and Sorel upon the French Revolution, pages which indicate that he may be on the point of modifying, if not his opinions, at least the severity of his censure. The last historical works of the Duc d'Aumale and of the Duc de Broglie are reviewed with generously given praise. But in general M. Brunetière prefers subjects upon which he can express opinions contrary to those that are finding favor at the present moment. Thus, M. Deschanel's 'Le Théâtre de Voltaire' has called up much adverse criticism upon the tragedies of that author. Whereupon the critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes exclaims: "And I, too, since everybody is talking about them, . . . have something to say about the plays of Voltaire"; and he finds much good to say about them, at the expense, of course, of Hugo and of Dumas and of "ce que nous applaudissons aujourd'hui sur nos scènes." Again, it is not the fashion at present to praise Lamartine, while Victor Hugo has received the apotheosis that we all know of. But M. Brunetière has an eulogium upon the former poet, immediately followed by an article upon Hugo in which, with great rhetorical precaution, more blame is dealt out than praise. The review of M. Raoul Frary's book calls up "La Question du latin," which for France is what the college Greek question is here. M. Brunetière speaks with eloquence and much feeling. Conservative as he is, it is not difficult to divine which side he takes. In fact, this may be done whatever subject he treats. He never separates his political bias from his literary appreciations. But, however he may offend those who disagree with him, however paradoxical at times he may seem, he stands, as the official critic of the Revue des Deux Mondes, in the very front rank of French critics, a man of ability, power, and decided opinions.

M. Jules Lemaitre continues the papers which brought him into sudden fame, "Les Contemporains" (Paris: Lecène & Oudin; Boston: Schoenhof). The young critic seems determined to embrace in his gallery contemporary literary and artistic celebrities widely differing in character, from Le Père Monsabré to Sarah Bernhardt, from the serene poet Leconte de Lisle to the more than gaulois Armand Sylvestre, from the fluidly unctuous and almost unseizable Renan of the "Abbesse de Jouarre" to the plainly outspoken and familiar Francisque Sarcey. And while he can be severe at times, he can find much to like and to praise in almost all. There is one conspicuous exception, however, M. Georges Ohnet, whom he has now sworn never to speak of again: "je n'en parlerai jamais plus, je le jure." This was after giving an account of the first representation of "La Comtesse Sarah," in the Journal des Débats on the 17th of January last; but it must be added that he did speak of him again, more severely than ever, in his very next feuilleton. It exasperates him to see Ohnet's novels reach such a fabulous number of editions, and he makes himself the organ of the secret voice that whispers in the ear of the successful novelist and playwright: "Tu est banal, banal, banal." Poverty of style, insipidity, conventionality, bourgeois snobbishness, are the highest qualities of which the voice speaks. "On te traduit dans toutes les langues, on te joue sur tous les théâtres, et ton nom est fameux même à Chicago." M. Lemaitre's ideas may be vague about Chicago and the amount of fame M. Ohnet may enjoy there, but they are never vague when he speaks of Daudet, or Anatole France, or Ferdinand Fabre.

One of the best articles is that on M. J.-J. Weiss, his predecessor as the theatrical critic of the Débats, whom M. Lemaitre, with notable differences, somewhat resembles. Of both might be said what he says of Weiss: "He freshens received opinions and makes them his by the extraordinary vivacity of his impression." To both would apply the phrase, Criticus scriptor additus scriptori; for M. Lemaitre is, more than any other of the numerous critics who treat of contemporary writers, a safe guide. He is generous and broad in the praise he gives; very fine, almost subtile in the nice appreciation of the methods of his brother critics: never pedantic, never too wise and sure of himself. His chief fault, one the reader easily forgives, is that his brightness almost seems like gaminerie at times. But there is more seriousness in him than his very modern and free use of language would lead one to attribute to him; for, whatever subject he treats, he is always vivacious, always apparently regardless—perhaps designedly so—of the somewhat hackneyed forms that modern criticism uses to say unpleasant or severe things. He does not always call a spade a spade, for that would be commonplace and might be brutal or coarse; but he is awed into respect by no name, however great, nor exasperated into abuse by any writing, however undeserving, always excepting the novels and plays of M. Georges Ohnet.

The third series of "Les Contemporains" (Paris: Lecène & Oudin) was published only a few weeks ago, and has just reached us. It contains fourteen 'Études et Portraits littéraires' which M. Lemaitre has contributed during the past year to the Revue Bleue, closing with the paper which appeared as lately as the number for February 12. This is the article upon M. Paul Bourget, in which the critic shows in such strong relief those qualities of the author which give him his value and his place apart in contemporary literature. When we read this paper, or those on the brothers De Goncourt, or Pierre Loti, or Jules de Glouvet, or Rabusson, or Feuillet, it seems as if M. Lemaitre was at his very best in treating of the authors of the roman contemporain in all its surprising diversity. But when he writes of Parisian chroniqueurs, Wolff and Blavet, Rochefort and Henry Fouquier, or of poets like Soulary or Jean Richepin, we feel in every fibre of malice there is in us such a sympathy with the critic, such an enjoyment of every fine sarcastic thrust, every delicate touch of the critical blade, that we are ready to say that here alone is he in the fullest exercise of all his best abilities. But it is only when we re-read one of his most serious papers that we feel the full power and range of his marvellously varied gifts as a writer and critic. Take the exquisite chapter on Gaston Paris and his 'Poésie au moyen âge,' for instance, with its charming introduction upon modern erudition and érudits, and its fine appreciation both of the scholar and of his subject; or the paper upon the Grand Condé as he is shown in the last volumes of the Duc d'Aumale, which begins, "It must be an agreeable thing to be a prince," and, after two pages of development, "But it must be, too, a very disagreeable thing to be a prince"—in all of which neither Condé nor the Duc d'Aumale is mentioned, but in every line of which the life of the hero and the work of his historian are profoundly commented upon: a fitting introduction to a chapter of historical criticism which has been called by G. Monod, in the Revue Historique, "un chef-d'œuvre à la fois d'esprit et de bon sens."

M. A. Claveau does not wish to be carried away by the waves of naturalism, impressionism, or any other of the literary isms, and so he writes his protests in 'Contre le Flot' (Paris: Ollendorff; Boston: Schoenhof). He deals out much indignation, sarcasm, and disdain. He amuses when he talks of the ever-rising wave of neologism, which makes it difficult even for a Frenchman to read with full understanding the latest novel or the latest play, and impossible for any one to understand all the words of some writers now in vogue. He takes the critics to task because they show too much complacency in dealing with the authors who pose before the public. He belabors the authors themselves for the brutality, the indecency, the general immorality of the works they produce. Nor is the public itself spared for tolerating and encouraging such a state of things. But it is not the great public, the bourgeois who roused Flaubert's antipathy, that M. Claveau has in view. It is the narrow public of dilettanti, of artists, of critics, of the coteries, on which he lays the blame. As to the grand public, all it wants, he tells us, is good books, pure books. The great success of the future, he thinks, will be for the writer "qui refera tout bêtement Paul et Virginie. C'est simple comme bonjour, c'est le pont aux ânes. Essayez plutôt." And thus he touches on many questions and occasionally reviews a recent book, like Zola's 'Germinal' or Maupassant's 'Bel-Ami,' or a work of Richepin. It is in such reviews that he is at his best. The rest is vague and unsatisfactory.

M. Robert de Bonnières is one of the most brilliant of the young generation of Parisian journalists. Under the signature of "Janus" he contributed to the Figaro, between 1880 and 1884, a series of portraits and criticisms from among which two volumes have already been published and a third is announced as in preparation, under the general title "Mémoires d'aujourd'hui" (Paris: Ollendorff; Boston: Schoenhof). Nothing more sparkling, more amusing can be imagined than the two series already published of these literary and political portraits. The first, collected in 1883, is almost wholly political; the second, published in 1885, is entirely literary. The latter are generally the most amusing and interesting on account of their subjects, but both series are equally well done, and they have a certain refinement, even when most insolently cutting, that makes them always pleasant reading. One of the most irreverential articles is devoted to M. Edmond Scherer, who had had the boldness to make some strictures upon the style of Molière, causing great indignation on the part of many, M. Robert de Bonnières among the number, who, with more cleverness and wit than fairness, writes of the critic of the Temps as if he were only a tedious and pretentious theological and political author, an incorrect writer of heavy Swiss-French, entirely lacking in taste and discrimination; and he concludes: "L'ennui, le lourd ennui, l'ennui fade, dont il a pétri toute son œuvre est à étouffer un honnête homme. . . . Ne lisez jamais M. Scherer!" From this it may be seen that M. de Bonnières is not tender as a critic. He has all the severity of a young writer, but also all the liveliness, and when he admires or respects a person his admiration and respect are expressed with a delightful frankness. It must be remembered that these volumes are not deliberate critical work, but articles in a great daily newspaper, dashed off at the moment and full of the moment's interest and brilliancy.

Between the publication of the two series of the "Mémoires d'aujourd'hui," the first novel of M. de Bonnières, 'Les Monach,' appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and was published in a volume in the winter of 1884-85 (Paris: Ollendorff). This was a remarkable picture of society in Paris in the grand monde, and in a corner of another world into which novelists have not penetrated—that of a Jewish family of millionaires, ambitious of entering the most exclusive circles, and successful to a certain extent. The story is not always agreeable, but it is always interesting and never hackneyed. The book was one of the literary successes of recent years—a very different thing from a great financial success, which always depends upon something besides literary merit, though happily not always excluding it. In the meantime a visit to Egypt and to India gave the young author the occasion for some charming letters written on the way, and for his second novel, 'Le Baiser de Maïna' (Paris: Ollendorff; Boston: Schoenhof), published early in 1886. This is an Indian romance of love, of which the author says that it is "the faithful image of the vision which he has had of India at Benares." As "a picture of Brahminic India as it appears to-day under the English domination," the work is only what might be expected; but, neglecting the English functionaries and all connected with them, the story itself is agreeable, and the native characters and scenes are full of animation and interest. As a conte bleu d'un pays bleu, 'Le Baiser de Maïna' is an entertaining and poetic story.

'Jeanne Avril,' the last work of M. de Bonnières, appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes in November and December last, and has since then been published in a volume (Paris: Ollendorff; Boston: Schoenhof). Like his first novel, it is a very promising book. It seems impossible that a writer who observes so profoundly, and describes what he sees so expressively and even powerfully, should not produce a novel of real value, not merely of great promise, which is all that can be said of either 'Les Monach' or 'Jeanne Avril'; but even this is enough to place M. de Bonnières in a rank far superior to that occupied by some of the most successful writers of fiction, though as yet far below the great masters of imaginative art.

POMEROY'S INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Lectures on International Law in Time of Peace. By John Norton Pomeroy, author of 'An Introduction to the Constitutional Law of the United States,' 'An Introduction to Municipal Law,' etc. Edited by Theodore Salisbury Woolsey, Professor of International Law in the Yale Law School. 8vo, pp. 481. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1886.

We welcome this volume of Lectures, which were delivered some twenty years ago, not only for its merits, but also as a sign that the American press is again becoming active in a department with which it was once quite familiar, that of Public International Law. Although our country had won an honorable reputation in this field, its energy, at least on a large scale, had (for whatever reasons) much fallen off. We have not even been able or careful to keep our laurels fresh. Leaving out of the account special and partial investigations of more or less moment, too much of the broader harvest of American thought and study has passed over to the guardianship of foreigners. Kent's 'Lectures' and President Woolsey's 'Introduction' have indeed been well tended at home by editor or author, although in the latter case we could wish that the author might revoke the farewell preface in his fifth edition, and give us by his own or a related hand the benefit of the gleanings of the last eight years; but Wheaton's 'History of the Law of Nations' has now to be sought only in its original French, and peculiar circumstances have driven from our market the American editions, annotated severally by two well-known publicists, of his 'Elements of International Law.' That standard work comes to us now most directly under English editorship. In like manner, Halleck's volume on 'International Law,' in its unabridged form, emigrated some time ago, and doubled itself through the labors of an English barrister. Mr. W. B. Lawrence, whose valuable 'Commentaire' on Wheaton's two works is very much more than a republication of its author's former notes, and too scantily describes its scope by its title, was issued in Europe in French; but Mr. R. H. Dana, with less anxious care, left his much-esteemed notes on the 'Elements' to await, at least in their essence, the complete treatise he had planned. This enterprise he did not live to carry out. The science and study of international law could not have suffered a greater loss. In this wreck or flight of home products, we have not even borrowed what we had ceased to make. It is, we believe, safe to say that, since the republication (more than thirty years ago) of the first edition of Phillimore's 'Commentaries,' scarcely one, if one, of the more recent important works on public international law issued in Europe has been reproduced in this country, either in its original language or in a translation. In this case, at least, American thought has not thriven on the non-importation of foreign ideas. We were nearly ceasing, except on narrow lines, to give or take. In this state of things, for which we need not try to account, we may well hail the appearance, within a few months of each other, of the 'Lectures' before us, and of those of Mr. Schuyler on 'American Diplomacy.' To these we may add Dr. Wharton's valuable Digest, which has already been noticed in our columns.

Professor Pomeroy's lectures, though only a moiety of his proposed contribution to the exposition of public international law, form a natural, if unfinished, sequel to his well-known writings on the 'Constitutional Law of the United States' and 'Municipal Law.' Had the author been spared to complete his plan by the addition of the war side of his subject, he might perhaps have preferred to pack all of his work, instead of one-half of it, into a single volume. The copious treatment that is fair to a hearer, who must catch ideas once for all as he can, is less essential to a reader, who can stop and think. This is a posthumous publication, and the lapse of twenty years, even when it does not touch the core of ideas, may somewhat affect their relative or casual significance, particularly if the topics in hand have a more or less historical bearing. It is here especially that an editor's office comes into play. These lectures are edited by Professor Woolsey, whose position and experience have made him quite at home in the field to which they belong. We are grateful to him for what he has done, and only wish that he had been less modest. We could have welcomed, for example, more abundant aid from him in regard to history and bibliography. He has rendered valuable service by what he has written on the "Right of Embassy," which fills up a blank caused by the loss of a part of Professor Pomeroy's manuscript.

Professor Woolsey says in his preface:

"Although twenty years have passed since these lectures were written, it is with no apology that they are now given to the profession. Prof. Pomeroy's opinions on the burning questions of the time—the recognition of Southern belligerency, State repudiation of debt, the naturalization difficulty—and on what are, so to speak, test questions in international law, such as those relating to its nature, foundation, and defects, to prescription, and so on, were so much in advance of the time when they were written, that even now public sentiment and public law are scarcely abreast of them." And, again: "The author delights . . . in clear definition, and orderly arrangement, and exact classification, and the search for the sources and logical results of principles which cannot change. His treatise, thus viewed, will be found a profound and original study of the sources and fundamental principles of International Law rather than a mere compendium of the accepted rules for the guidance of nations in their daily, peaceful intercourse."

We have no wish, and we certainly do not undertake, to question these high claims in general. The editor has here, as it seems to us, noted some of the salient merits of these lectures. A remark or two, however, may be allowed. In regard, for instance, to the doctrine of international prescription, our author, who totally rejects it, and puts very forcibly the objections to it, was perhaps too strongly moved by the triumphs of the sentiment of nationality, a natural foe of prescription, in the European crisis of 1866. United Germany and United Italy carry him, indeed, beyond the pale of history into the realm of prophecy. He is warmed into saying (with rather ungrammatical zeal) that international prescription "never has and never can exist." He may be right; but the converts in the last twenty years to this strong view, at least among writing publicists, appear to be few. Recent science seems to be hardly yet "abreast" of the author at this point. We may refer here in particular to Hall's excellent note on nationality ('International Law,' part ii, chapter ii), which, of course, was later in time than these lectures. Nor was Dr. Pomeroy able to cite those late writers who, on one or another point, have failed to be quite "convinced" by Mr. Marcy's reasoning in the Koszta case. (By the way, Tousig's case was not that of "a man of American naturalization," but of one who had only declared his intention to become such.) It might have been worth while, also, to quote (even if disapprovingly) what "Historicus" (Vernon-Harcourt) said in 1861 of the Hülsemann affair, namely, that "by the general opinion of Europe this transaction was severely reprobated." In the list of important treaties (p. 34), that of 1819, popularly known as the Florida treaty, should have been inserted. Dr. Pomeroy's description of the Constitution of the Swiss Confederation was singularly behindhand when it was written, and is more behindhand now. The modest space occupied on the map by the only existing European federal republic (a republic, too, whose political and constitutional history has striking points of similarity or analogy with our own) is no gauge of its historical or political measure. If mentioned at all, it deserved to be accurately mentioned. Again, the "Tindal" who is followed by a blank in the list of authorities, is the once famous deistical writer, Matthew Tindal, who, before he became noted in that character, had issued four "Discourses" on certain questions of public interest, and is said to have sat more than once in the Court of Delegates (the predecessor of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council) under William III. The author's pertinent quotation from Tindal comes through Phillimore. We are not seeking to emphasize the slight errors or omissions that must inevitably creep into the first edition of a posthumous work, and would only add that dates have not always been exactly given. A word, however, on two points of style. To mention is to reprobate the use of transpire in the sense of 'happen,' pure and simple; and "the United States has" strikes us as odd from the pen of a close student of the Articles of Confederation and of the Constitution of the United States, both of which, through the pronominal adjective "their," discountenance such a construction.

RECENT NOVELS.

A Millionaire of Rough and Ready, and Devil's Ford. By Bret Harte. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The Golden Justice. By William Henry Bishop. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

By Woman's Wit: A Novel. By Mrs. Alexander. Henry Holt & Co. [Leisure Hour Series.]

Borderland. A Country Town Chronicle. By Jessie Fothergill. Henry Holt & Co. [Leisure Hour Series.]

MOST of Bret Harte's stories have, in a measure, the advantage which Mr. Lowell says "the flavor of the soil" gives to writings in a foreign tongue. The picture of a mining-camp—with its strange atmosphere of adventure, romance, and freedom—always appeals to one's interest in what is novel and distant, and never seems to grow stale and common though ever so frequently drawn. The life of miners, their occasional wonderful success, their frequent failures, their fascinated patience, their gambler's superstition, have almost become stock properties in Mr. Harte's tales. It seems as if he had but to shift the scene a little, thrust forward one or two new characters, and he has a fresh story made to hand. The queer thing about stories which give this impression on the one hand is, that, on the other hand, they seem and really are fresh. They are pleasant and entertaining, too, always, and are now and then vivified by a touch of true dramatic power. The real fault to be found with Mr. Harte's work is not its exaggeration or lack of simplicity, but that it consists so much of touches. He apparently dislikes the minor and tedious part of story-writing, and often leaves the machinery of his plot working very loosely. There are plenty of indications of power and insight in the story of Slinn and Alvin Mulrady, which ends almost as abruptly as did Sancho's tale of the goatherd when his master lost track of the number of goats; but, to judge it from a literary standpoint, it is incomplete and unfinished.

Mr. Bishop develops a story with the greatest care and circumspection; he leaves no point, however insignificant it may be, unexplained, no turn of chance or fortune unaccounted for. So careful is he, indeed, to bring every incident of his story within the bounds of possibility that his explanations sometimes seem redundant and obstructive. This may appear the more necessary in a story such as 'The Golden Justice,' wherein several coincidences are so strange and unlikely that deference to the limit of credulity requires a very close and careful fitting of the several parts. But then it is held by no less an authority than Mr. Howells himself that a reality which seems unreal is unfit for fiction. There would, however, be no question, one supposes, in a case where the writer's skill can give to unusual things that color and semblance of actuality without which a recital of the most every-day occurrences would sound bare and lifeless. The dictum might reasonably be accepted merely as a piece of friendly advice, cautioning one to avoid the trouble and worry of attempting too much; and, so considered, might with profit be taken to heart by Mr. Bishop. The idea of the Golden Justice containing the confession of David Lane is so bizarre that one's mind, in spite of the element of tragedy in the background, can hardly recognize with due seriousness its important function in the story; and one's attention is so diverted from the real excellences of Mr. Bishop's work by the Gaboriau-like coincidences that, when the confession of David Lane is blown by the whirlwind to the very feet of Paul Barclay—of all men in the world—one is inclined to call it mere juggling with permutations. The ethical truth embodied in the story of David Lane is lost sight of in following the ingenious threads by which his troubles are shown to have arisen from his crime.

Mrs. Alexander has added still another to the already long list of commonplace readable novels which she has written. 'By Woman's Wit,' while not coming up to 'The Wooing O't' in interest, is neither above nor below the general average of Mrs. Alexander's work. She weaves and unravels the tangled web of a diamond robbery with a due amount of lively incidents, love, and jealousy to prevent her readers—most of whom find Thackeray dull and go to sleep over Scott—from being bored.

The author of 'Borderland,' who also can write a respectably long list of titles after her name, is not so successful as Mrs. Alexander in maintaining the reader's interest. Yet 'Borderland' is marked by certain good qualities which are entirely lacking in the more popular writer's works. Chief among these is a tone of seriousness which goes far toward lifting the story out of the category of sensational novels.

A Short History of Parliament. By B. C. Skottowe, M.A. Harper & Bros. 1887.

To distinguish between a history of the British Constitution and a history of the British Parliament is not a very easy matter. That Constitution being so purely an abstraction that it lacks even the embodiment of paper and ink, it is necessary to search for it in institutions of a more tangible character. We find some portions of it still adhering to the throne, but it is almost all to be looked for in Parliament; in the body of precedents, rules, customs, and sentiments in accordance with which Parliamentary action proceeds. Without denying that it would be possible to construct a history of Parliament that should not be a constitutional history, we should yet maintain that such a history would be a very meagre affair. It would be like relating the history of a man by exhibiting the successive suits of clothes that he wore: we should learn much of his habits and circumstances, but we should know little of his life.

Mr. Skottowe's book is quite properly, therefore, a constitutional history, and it is a very good one. Ordinary readers who find Prof. Stubbs's style impenetrable, can hardly do better than to take at least their first lessons in the great story of the rise of our liberties from Mr. Skottowe. They may thus get an impetus that will carry them over the stiffer reading that will still remain to be done. For the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, indeed, very few persons would require a fuller account of the development of constitutional government than they will find in this book, and they will nowhere find one that is more readable. There seems, however, to be one serious gap in the narrative: the important period between the declaration of war by Parliament against the King and the Restoration certainly deserves more attention than it here receives.

It is Mr. Skottowe's object, he informs us, to impart a certain amount of life to the dry bones which are strewn in the way of the constitutional student, and to combine instruction with a certain amount of amusement. There are, unquestionably, abundant materials for such a purpose, and the author displays in the main very good judgment in his selection. Some good things, of course, must be left out, but we should have been glad if the author had not felt it necessary, in the chapter on "Men and Debates," to omit all reference to Sheridan. Macaulay, too, ought to have received a little attention. The chapter on "The Inner Life of Parliament" contains much that is curious and entertaining. The spirit of mischief seems to have possessed porters at an early day. They established their rights substantially in 1771, but as they were not officially recognized until 1834, when the new Houses of Parliament were built, they conducted themselves with great license:

"Under the influence of party feeling, they would ruthlessly cut down the most beautiful oratory of Burke, Fox, or Sheridan into a few bald lines; pure malice sometimes induced them to place ridiculous ineptitudes in the mouths of distinguished men, solely with the view of making them ridiculous. Mr. Wilberforce, on one occasion, read out and bitterly complained of an extract from a newspaper in which he was reported to have recommended the cultivation of potatoes in the following terms: 'Potatoes make men healthy, vigorous, active; but, what is still more in their favor, they make men tall. More especially was he led to say so as being rather under the common size, and he must lament that his guardians had not fostered him under that genial vegetable.' The passage was naturally received with peals of laughter, though the evil was only too apparent."

Mr. Skottowe calls attention to one fact that is not generally known: by the Act of Union, the creation of new Scotch peerages was prohibited. The old ones are therefore gradually becoming extinct, or practically absorbed in the English peerage by grants of English patents. Hence many Scotch peers in the House of Lords owe their seats to some obscure English title. The Duke of Argyll sits as Baron Sundridge, and the Duke of Buccleuch as Earl of Doncaster. As neither Scotch peers nor their eldest sons can sit in the House of Commons, and only sixteen can be members of the House of Lords, most of them are entirely debarred from political life.

The Campaign of Fredericksburg. By a Line Officer. London: Kegan Paul, Trench & Co. New York: Scribner & Welford.

THIS little book, though written by a British officer from a professional standpoint, and designed for professional use as "a study for officers of volunteers," is not technical, and is altogether one of the clearest and best critiques of the campaign of November-December, 1862, in Virginia that we have seen. The plans of both commanders and the movements of both armies are briefly but clearly set forth, the errors both of omission and commission are fairly discussed, and frequent parallels are pointed out in ancient and modern military history. No layman can rise from its perusal without a good comprehension of that famous battle and of the operations that preceded and followed it. The value of the book is greatly increased by admirable maps, which are a model of simplicity and elegance.

The wretched handling of the Army of the Potomac in this campaign, Burnside's weakness and incapacity, Franklin's feebleness, and the general want of coöperation and of confidence, are well described, as is, too, the splendid valor that wasted itself in fruitless assaults on Marye's Hill. Lee's skilful strategy and the excellent disposition of his forces for battle are distinctly shown, and are brought into strong contrast with those of his adversary; but the Confederate commander is severely criticised for not attacking Burnside before he recrossed the river, and thus converting a bloody repulse into an overwhelming defeat. The author thinks Lee was held back by insufficient reasons, and he discusses these in detail. Most of them probably weighed but slightly with Lee. The real obstacle to a successful attack, in Lee's judgment, was the Federal artillery on the Stafford Heights, which commanded the plain where the Federal army was, and the river crossings, so completely as to render assault with a smaller force, upon well-posted and veteran troops, hopeless. There was nothing in the gallant attacks on Marye's Hill, continued until nightfall, or in Meade's vigorous push against Jackson on the other flank, to justify the conclusion that the Federal army was demoralized and would not have made a vigorous resistance to assault; and Lee believed that assaulting columns would be torn to pieces by the artillery north of the river which he could not neutralize. This same question came up again next spring, when Hooker threw Sedgwick across at the same place, to cover his own operations at Chancellorsville. The propriety of attacking Sedgwick was a matter of earnest consideration between Jackson and Lee, and, after a careful reconnoissance by the former, it was agreed by both that such a movement promised no good result. Our author thinks Lee was in error, and that, like Hannibal at the Trebia, he ought to have destroyed Burnside. This may be so, but it is very doubtful. It is certain that both Lee and Jackson, the two ablest Confederate commanders, twice judged such an attempt impossible.

Reminiscences of a Country Journalist. By Thomas Frost. Scribner & Welford.

MR. FROST has followed many occupations besides that of a country journalist, as is known to those who have read his previous volume of autobiography, to which the present one is supplementary. He began printer, and became one of that large and obscure staff of men who supply matter for cheap periodicals and keep the publishers' presses going; to adopt a phrase from his original calling, it would not be unfair to describe him as a tramp writer. Fiction was but one of his fields, and in it he made his first successes; he also tried the drama, but with no other result than a sharp and frequently expressed feeling of indignation towards the readers of plays for the theatre. His various volumes, made up from other books, however, had good fortune and found both publishers and readers. He also wrote in connection with the press, and held editorial positions. The career of such a writer is rather of interest as an example than in itself. It was marked by great industry and versatility, and yet more by its uncertainty, while the sidelights thrown upon the ways of editors and publishers in those departments of literature which Mr. Frost cultivated, are dreary enough to warn any young author from his profession. He says his gains from journalism never exceeded £100 a year, and from journalism and literature combined never exceeded £200, "an amount which I received, in fact, for only one year, when I edited a periodical, wrote leaders and leaderettes for two newspapers, and was an occasional contributor to two or three other publications." In another place he remarks, "Of every half-dozen manuscripts which I have sent to the editors of magazines only one has been accepted, while three have been returned, and two neither returned nor accepted." Yet he was a practised, and often a successful writer, and, as we have said, the author of a large number of compiled books which had a sale.

These reminiscences are not altogether of his own affairs, but, being written in a very rambling way, allow innumerable episodes to give variety to the story without interrupting its very lazy course. Thus, at the beginning there are some delightful glimpses of the rural life of Croydon, before London stretched out and absorbed its woods and green lanes and scattered its gypsies; and from chapter to chapter one comes upon anecdotes of English life and character of strong, unconscious realism. One is worth relating as an indication of how the world moves. It is told of Mr. Bean, the founder of the Liverpool Albion. Canning always desired to have an opportunity to correct the report of his speeches, and Mr. Bean would bring proofs to him at Liverpool, where he visited Col. Bolton. "Mrs. Bolton," our writer says, "had a great contempt for 'newspaper men,' and evinced it when Bean called upon Canning, at her house in Duke Street, by invariably desiring the servant to bring a chair from the kitchen for his use while he was engaged with the statesman. Bean is said to have felt the insult very deeply," Mr. Frost goes on, "but it does not appear that he ever resented it." There are many recollections of English journalists in the volume, and in particular of the Yorkshire Chartist writers, but all these are ill-digested and generally of trivial consequence. The circus performers, too, of whom Mr. Frost once wrote a book, come in for some mention, and are quoted as professing great contempt for Dickens's pictures of circus life. So, truly, one meets in this book many people of many minds, and perhaps not very well worth knowing; but the author himself, who is a candid man, is not the least entertaining of his characters. He is sixty-five years old, and, after a life of hard work, has nothing to show for it in the funds; he professes himself satisfied with having "done something, according to the measure of my capacities and opportunities, to keep society moving ever onward to a higher and better phase." Without regard to this philanthropic aim, he maintained his own independence of character and his self respect through the trials and temptations of a precarious career; and one recognizes in him the old virtues of pluck and grit, as well as other qualities of "the true-born Englishman."

The Letters of Cassiodorus: being a Condensed Translation of the Variæ Epistolæ of Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus, Senator, with an Introduction, by Thomas Hodgkin, Fellow of University College, London, etc. Oxford: Clarendon Press; New York: Macmillan. 8vo, pp. 560.

MR. HODGKIN describes his condensed translation of the Letters of Cassiodorus as belonging "to that class of work which Prof. Max Müller happily characterized when he entitled two of his volumes 'Chips from a German Workshop.'" The chips in the present basket accumulated in the course of the preparation of the last two volumes of 'Italy and her Invaders' (reviewed in the Nation of May 13, 1886). The notes thus collected were intended to form the basis of a chapter in his history. The materials, however, he says, "were so manifold, so perplexing, so full of curious and unexpected detail, that I quite despaired of ever succeeding in the attempt to group them into one harmonious and artistic picture. Frankly, therefore, renouncing a task which is beyond my powers, I offer my notes for the perusal of the few readers who may care to study the mutual relations of the Roman and the Teutonic mind upon one another in the sixth century, and I ask these to accept the artist's assurance, 'The curtain is the picture.'"

The reader of these letters will obtain from them a knowledge of society and government in Italy during the first half of the sixth century such as few epochs of ancient history can present. The letters of Cicero and of Pliny suggest themselves at once to the mind, as similar in kind and very superior in quality; for their letters are not so insufferably rhetorical as those of Cassiodorus, and, moreover, they deal very largely with private concerns, which Cassiodorus hardly touches upon. These letters are almost entirely official, are very formal, and, even after Mr. Hodgkin has reduced their bulk by about one-half, are for the most part very long-winded and tiresome. But, such as they are, they are indispensable to any one who would study this period at first hand, and invaluable for the light they throw upon that most obscure event—the Germanic occupation of the Roman Empire.

Invaluable as they are, the reader of these letters is surprised at the small amount of direct information derived from them in regard to the organization of the government and the relations of the Romans to the Goths. Cassiodorus had in the highest degree the capacity—which belongs, we suppose, as well to his profession as to his age—of using a great many words and saying a very little. Even books vi and vii, which contain formulæ for the several offices of the Empire, consist mainly of vague declamation, and give very little knowledge of the duties attached to these offices, except by way of incidental mention.

In certain other matters we receive a great deal of information, such as it is; and here is found a considerable part of the interest, if not of the value, of the book. The writer could not let go an opportunity of imparting his varied and curious information; much of it very curious, but not all reliable. Thus, on the occasion of condemning a criminal, he writes to the Prætorian Præfect as follows (book iii, letter 47): "He shall be banished to the Vulcanian [Lipari] Islands, there to live away from the paternal hearth, but ever in the midst of burning, like the Salamander, which is a small and subtile beast, of kin to the slippery worm, clothed with a yellow color. The substance of volcanoes, which is perpetually destroyed, is by the inextricable power of Nature perpetually renewed. The Vulcanian Islands are named from Vulcan, the god of fire, and burst into eruption on the day when Hannibal took poison at the court of Prusias. It is especially wonderful that a mountain kindling into such a multitude of flames should yet be half hidden by the waves of the sea." There are a number of other similar essays, on the chameleon (p. 284), on the gout (p. 440) and consumption (p. 468), on elephants (p. 442), on paper (p. 483), on the water at Ravenna, which appears to have been as bad then as now (p. 286).

Perhaps as interesting a piece of special information as any is found in letter 4 of book ix, in regard to the family which, at its own request, had been relieved of the rank of curialis. "Remitted to the ranks of [mere] Possessores, they will now be liable to the same demands which formerly [as members of the Curiæ] they made upon others." Five books out of twelve consist of letters written in the name of Theodoric, and bear constant testimony to his justice and humanity.

The Castellated and Domestic Architecture of Scotland, from the Twelfth to the Eighteenth Century. By David MacGibbon and Thomas Ross, Architects. Vol. I. Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1887. 8vo, pp. xvi, 584.

MESSRS. MACGIBBON AND ROSS'S book is a very welcome one. The only other we know which in any considerable degree covers the same subject is Billings's 'Baronial and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of Scotland.' But, though that is as excellent in its kind as all his work is, its fine plates show the examples only in their picturesque aspects. The paucity of views, the absence of plans and details, make the volumes very inadequate for professional use; the text, which is mainly historical and antiquarian, gives no full descriptions, and makes no attempt at comparative study. This book, on the other hand, is thoroughly professional. The subject is one in which only a Scotch antiquarian could bring the authors to book on questions of detail; but their work is done with method and intelligence, with every appearance of accuracy and of thorough familiarity with the subject.

The first volume, now presented, contains about a hundred examples of Scottish castles and residences, chronologically classed, described in detail, and illustrated with great fulness, from the earliest that remain down to the middle of the sixteenth century. It is prefaced by a good summary of the parallel development of military architecture in France and England. The division into periods or the classification that accompanies it may strike one as a little arbitrary—perhaps any positive division in a series of so gradual development would appear so; yet in tracing out the examples of such a development it is essential to pause at intervals to survey the field. It is always a question in systematic study of architecture whether, in buildings which include the structures of different periods, the description of their parts shall be assigned each to its own period, or whether the full discussion of a building shall be given with the period to which its most important features belong. There is temptation to follow the first method for the sake of logical cohesion; but in a book which, like this, is of the nature of a hand-book, the authors have done well, we think, to follow the second plan. Many books of like scope have been nearly ruined for consultation by the dispersion of their examples in fragments.

Scotland's chronic hostility to England and preference for Continental alliances made her a meeting-ground for various influences in architectural style as well as in politics. While she could not help taking lessons in building from the neighbor at her elbow, her segregation from her, or the obstinacy that led to it, shows curiously in her persistence in certain fashions of building, and in the slowness of her progress, as well as in the appearance at various intervals of symptoms of foreign influences—Scandinavian, French, and even Spanish. We find in the examples here given illustrations of Scotch conservatism in certain architectural forms which are adhered to with striking pertinacity — for instance, the belated round arch, the stepped gable, the square (or rather oblong) keep. It is seen equally in the avoidance of certain other forms, for instance, the tower of horse-shoe plan, common in Roman fortification and in mediæval castles and enceintes in France, or the round tower with a salient angle or keel, of which there is a solitary example in Borthwick Castle. The comparative poverty of the Scottish nobles, their somewhat backward civilization, and the relative fixity of military architecture, which is always slower to change than ecclesiastical, make this conservatism more apparent in the castles than in the churches of their country. Messrs. MacGibbon and Ross trace the course of architecture of the latter in a clear-headed fashion, with a moderation of statement and an absence of fads which is very agreeable, and not always found in antiquarian writers. These five or six hundred pages and almost as many illustrations bear witness to a great amount of laborious research.

The abundant illustrations are reproductions of pen-drawings, of which the most pirited bear the initials D. M. G. Of course these lack the picturesque beauty, often somewhat forced, of Billings's plates, and their smaller scale makes them less graphic in detail, but their professional character appears in their straightforward clearness as well as in their choice and fulness. A comparison of them with those of Billings where they represent the same subject is creditable to the substantial accuracy of both, though one finds occasionally a variation in proportions, and once in a while a discrepancy of more significance, as where, in a tower-room of Dirleton Castle, Billings represents the vaulting with ribs which our authors, no doubt with truth, omit. Indeed, juxtaposition of both of these authorities with Dollman's detailed and apparently accurate drawings, in the examples which all three of them have illustrated, while it displays an essential agreement, is also now and then a witness to the difficulty which every investigator meets in architectural research as in all other departments of human testimony—the difficulty of getting at absolute truth in small particulars from a variety of authorities. Comparison with Billings's plates, moreover, shows us painfully in many cases the progress of dilapidation since his day, and sometimes of alteration, reminding us that this new record, well made and made once for all, has not been undertaken too soon. We hope that the completion of it will not wait long.

Grundriss der romanischen Philologie, unter Mitwirkung von fünfundzwanzig Fachgenossen herausgegeben von Gustav Gröber, Professor in Strassburg. Strassburg: Karl J. Trübner. 8vo.

Prof. Gröber's series is calculated to embrace six good-sized volumes, and undertakes to sketch in detail the Romance languages, their historic evolution and method of study, more exhaustively and comprehensively than has ever been attempted before. Since it is impossible that one man should possess such an enormous mass of well-digested learning, and write it down with his own hands, the editor has judiciously selected twenty-five competent coworkers in the various branches. To himself Gröber reserved the composition of the introduction and other articles of more generic import, together with a special article on French and another on Latin literature. Literature is, of course, in a Cyclopædia of Philology, as important a matter as the languages themselves; and Gröber has accordingly devised a separate article for each of the eight principal Romance languages. The wide scientific scope taken by Gröber's series further appears from the following treatises intended to be incorporated into the body of the work: An article on elements adopted from foreign languages; another upon the influence of indigenous languages, as Iberic, Celtic, Ancient Italic, on Romance languages; one on the use of Latin in Romance-speaking countries (by W. Meyer). A history of civilization among the Romance nations will be furnished by A. Schultz; their political history is to be dealt with by Scheffer-Boichorst. Even the history of plastic art and music is not omitted, and will conclude the last volume, though poetry is treated of in earlier and separate chapters together with stylistic art.

The propædeutic and methodic portion of the series lies complete before us in the first number, and permits a favorable augury for the whole. Linguistic inquiry is kept altogether separate from philologic research, and the method of the latter has been outlined by Prof. A. Tobler of Berlin. As for the sources of Romance philology, the oral are kept distinct from the literary preserved in script. W. Schum, who has discoursed upon the latter, also presents a full and detailed system of palæography, evidently based on the author's own experience. On page 149 Gröber mentions as the end and scope of Romance philology "scientific research concerning Romance speech, of which the origin has, in the lapse of centuries, become incomprehensible." The countries lying beyond the limits of Romance speech, as Northern Europe, have contributed powerfully to the study of these languages, and Germany more than others, for her scholars first applied the comparative method of Bopp to these and all other tongues, whether of literary or illiterate nations. It is touching to read the well-deserved homage paid by the editor to the immortal merits of W. Schlegel and Diez (pp. 90 91). On the other hand, it is exhilarating, with our present ideas of linguistics, to follow up the first attempts in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to derive certain French terms from Greek, as was done by Budé, Du Bois, Périon, and others, and to notice how gradually an improvement took place in this line through the writings of Pasquier, De Caseneuve, Chastelain, and especially of the celebrated Ménage, the father of modern French etymology.

The earlier portion of the second number (pp. 283-414) is devoted to seven treatises upon the languages spoken in various European countries prior to the advent or formation of the Romance tongues now prevalent. The extent to which these earlier languages have influenced the latter is also made the object of careful investigation. In his article upon the Celtic dialects of Gaul, E. Windisch states his opinion that in middle and northern France the Celtic lost its hold between the third and the fifth centuries after Christ, while Aquitania and "the Narbonensis province" had been thoroughly Romanized at a much earlier period. G. Gerland, Professor of Ethnology in Strassburg, confirms the result of former investigators, that the Basques of our days are the direct descendants of the Iberi at the beginning of our era, and that they formerly held a much larger territory than they do now. In his article on the ancient languages of Italy, W. Deecke counts the Etruscan among the Italic languages, and hence regards it as cognate with Latin, Umbrian, and Oscan. M. Gaster discusses the non-Latin elements in the Rumanic (or Wallachian) vocabulary, and F. Kluge does the same for the Germanic terms found in the Romanic languages.

With another section of the book begins the discussion of the grammatic elements of the languages in question. This section is introduced by their scientific classification at the hands of the editor. Of the three dialects of Rumanic, only one is thoroughly studied by H. Tiktin, for the two others have never furnished enough materials to make full study possible. In the Alpine ridge Rhetoromanic is spoken in more than twenty narrowly circumscribed dialectic forms, but only four of them have developed into something that can be called a literary language; these are exhaustively treated, though only in their grammatical aspect, by Th. Gartner. The second number breaks off abruptly in the midst of the interesting article on the Italian language, and it is expected that the third number will form the completion of the first volume.

We look forward with great interest to the continuation of this useful series, which is printed in rather small Roman type, though handsomely, and contains all the literary quotations needful to those who desire to undertake studies subsidiary to the information contained in the 'Grundriss,' as the editor modestly calls his cyclopædia.

Histoire de l'Art dans la Flandre, l'Artois, et le Hainaut avant le xve siècle. Par M. le chanoine Dehaisnes. Lille. 1886. 3 vols., 4to.

It is much to be wished that the reverend author of this valuable treatise had included Brabant in the provinces to the history of whose arts he has devoted so many years of his life. As it is, however, he has produced a work of the first importance, which must certainly take its place upon the shelves that are fortunate enough to carry the Comte de Laborde's 'Ducs de Bourgogne' and Weale's 'Beffroi.' The second and third volumes are filled with a prodigious collection of previously unpublished documents, and extracts from documents of all kinds which can be made to throw light on the obscure history of the mediæval arts. In the first volume the bearing of the documents is indicated in a readable history. This deals first with the dark ages, which were not so very dark, after all, until the Norse invasions of the ninth century came and involved Gallo-Roman, Merovingian, and Carlovingian monuments in a common ruin. The slow struggles towards a revival are next traced with wonderful painstaking, and then the great burst of art which flashed upon all the feudal countries of Europe about the beginning of the twelfth century, and which deserves to be called the Renaissance far more than that southern product of four centuries later. When the twelfth and thirteenth centuries arrive, the author is forced to break up his subject and deal with it piece by piece, following the artistic developments in the different towns, Bruges, Ghent, Douai, Lille, Valenciennes, Cambrai, and the rest, one by one. At Bruges and Ypres, civic architecture is the matter of chief importance; at Tournai and Cambrai, cathedrals and abbeys naturally attract most attention. The archives of Douai fortunately contain a long and most interesting series of ancient testamentary documents, through study of which M. Dehaisnes has been enabled to take his readers into the very houses and closets of the well-to-do burghers, and to show us the tapestries, the jewels, the gold and silver work, the carved furniture, the illuminated prayer-books, and other works of art which they contained. Nor are these volumes devoid of new matters of interest in connection with individual artists, whether they be men already famous, such as Villard de Honnecourt and Melchior Broederlam, or great but till now almost wholly forgotten workers like Andrieu Beauneveu of Valenciennes, sculptor, painter, and miniaturist of the first rank in the latter half of the fourteenth century. The lover of ancient tapestry will find a mass of information about the early history of the art—two new documents relating to the first high-warp weavers of Arras being of special importance. Some half dozen chapters deal with the influence upon art exercised by the noble houses of the day—an influence which does not always seem to have been for good. The volume concludes with a couple of chapters, containing an important general review of the whole ground covered by the work.

The volumes are well printed, and the first contains some fifteen Dujardin plates. The e are several indices of a very complete character, and there is a glossary of words not included in Ducange and the usual authorities.

George Ide Chace, LL.D. A Memorial, edited by James O. Murray. Cambridge: Printed at the Riverside Press. 1886.

THE quarto form and general appearance of this "memorial" are unnecessarily suggestive of that obituary character which discourages the general reader from making the acquaintance of a book that is so marked. For it is not as if the life and character and influence and standing of Prof. Chace were not such as to amply justify a brief biography and a selection from his philosophical discourses; nor as if these had not an interest and value for a good many readers not included in the sphere of his college influence and work. He was born in Lancaster, Mass., in 1808, on a big farm from whose soil he drew a love of nature and of out door life. An accident, which housed him for a time, made him a student, and secured for him a college course at Brown University. Graduating in 1830, he was made tutor there in 1831, and for forty-one years, without a break, he remained in the service of his Alma Mater. In 1834 he was made Professor of Chemistry. In 1836 geology and physiology were added to his chair. On the death of President Sears in 1866, he was made President ad interim, and would undoubtedly have been made President in full had not the tradition of the college demanded a clerical head. To make it easier for another to step into his rightful place, he exchanged his scientific chair for that of moral and intellectual philosophy; the moral and philosophical and theological implications of science having long had for him a great attraction. The change, nevertheless, was not agreeable, and was only undertaken out of loyalty to his college and veneration for Dr. Caswell, who, on his elevation to the Presidency, could not undertake the labor of instruction usually associated with it. Prof. Chace did the work assigned to him creditably and efficiently for five years, and then went abroad for a protracted period of travel, "preferring to close his professional career while he was in full strength and vigor." That he was no Dryasdust is shown by his election as an Alderman of Providence in 1878 and again in 1879, and also by his work on the State Board of Charities and Corrections, which continued for nine years, and was terminated voluntarily only two years before his death in 1885.

The biographical sketch is very largely made up of reminiscences by Dr. Geo. P. Fisher and others, who were either his pupils or his fellow-teachers in the University. The impression we derive is of a faithful, earnest, and laborious man, with little originality of thought or presentation, but with an enthusiasm that was contagious and a style of writing and speaking that was incisive and impressive. His limitation was most striking on the side of German philosophical thought. Thus, in his development of Locke, he stopped short with Reid and Stewart. His confidence in the theistic argument from design suggests that Kant was wholly strange to him. Six of his lectures and essays are given—the most elaborate, "A Discourse on Francis Wayland," for whom his admiration was great, but with whom he sometimes took issue widely and clearly. A list of his contributions to the Bibliotheca Sacra and other reviews is a valuable addition to the book.

THE PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

EDITED BY

JAMES A. H. MURRAY, B.A., Hon. M.A., LL.D., D.C.L.,

Sometime President of the Philological Society. With the Assistance of many Scholars and Men of Science.

Parts 1, 2, and 3 (A Boz). 4to. Each $3.25.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

No one will hesitate to say that the speedy completion of this vast undertaking is, or ought to be, an object of great concern to every educated speaker of English. . . . Every Englishman who can possibly afford it ought to do his part in forwarding this great enterprise of national interest by purchasing the parts as they appear.—Athenæum.

This monumental work.—London Times.

An achievement without parallel.—Academy.

The execution beggars all eulogy. . . . This wonderful book.—St. James's Gazette.

For the first time we have a dictionary based on historic principles presented to us. . . . A work of this description is truly a national work.—Spectator.

That great Anglo-Saxon undertaking. . . . We need hardly remind our readers that this work ought to be not only in every gentleman's library, but in every intelligent household.—Nation.

This monumental work.—Prof. James M. Garnett in American Journal of Philology.

Certainly the Englishmen of this generation will bequeath to those that come after them no richer legacy than this.—New York Times.

This dictionary is the most important contribution ever yet made to the history of our language. No one is safe in giving the history of an English word without consulting it. No one can consult it without learning something. . . . No student of language can do without it; every Anglo-Saxon may be proud of it.—Independent.

JAMES FRASER, SECOND BISHOP OF MANCHESTER. By Thomas Hughes, Q.C. With portrait. 8vo, $4.50.

"No bishop in recent times was more practically useful, more widely popular or universally lamented than the late Bishop of Manchester. His life was worth writing, and it has been well written by a man who possesses special qualifications for the task. . . . Whoever desires to study the character of a brave, earnest, God-fearing man who was, in the highest sense of the word, useful in his generation, should read the life of James Fraser as it is told in Judge Hughes's admirable volume."—Athenæum.

"THREE IS A CROWD is a saying which applies to the case of tourists almost as well as to that of lovers, but Mrs. Dodd does not allow her reader to feel the least bit out of place while she takes her way with her husband along the pleasant roads and past the scented hedgerows of England on a happy pilgrimage to some of the cathedral towns of that merry land. Mrs. Dodd holds a bewitching pen, and she wiles the miles away most swiftly and pleasantly. Many a fireside journey will be made during the chilly days of April, under her guidance, and when summer is here more than one work-bound toiler will rest and refresh himself over these simple records of a delightful 'outing,' feeling as he reads almost as if he were on the same pleasant journey himself," says the Chicago Tribune of 'Cathedral Days.' By Anna Bowman Dodd. Price $2.00. ROBERTS BROS., Publishers.

Many of these unfortunates require prolonged and elaborate treatment, much of which necessarily must be carried out in the absence of the physician. This, together with information as to the care of such patients, also as to the use of massage, electricity, bathing, etc., by nurses, this book endeavors to give.

"Mrs. Potter's Recitations have a world-wide reputation, and in compliance with numerous requests for copies of her selections, she has gathered and published them under one cover. A handsome phototype of the fair elocutionist makes a fitting frontispiece."—Baltimore American.

Goethe-Carlyle Correspondence.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GOETHE AND CARLYLE. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. 12mo, $2.

"The publication in full of this remarkable series of letters is by far the pleasantest of recent contributions to the Carlyle literature. . . . There is a substantial addition to the philosopher's biography which everybody who cares at all for the subject will value for the strong light it throws upon the most attractive side of Carlyle's character. He is represented here in the full possession of all the domestic and minor virtues of which his later life seemed bare."—New York Tribune.

"Preserves in a scholarly form the matter that the world will not willingly let die. . . . The book is one of the most valuable contributions to contemporary literature."—Boston Evening Traveller.

"A collection of letters at once interesting and enlightening. . . . Like the 'Early Letters,' issued a few months ago from the hands of the same admirable editor, the letters here given embrace a period of which there has been either a dearth of information or a superabundance of false impressions. . . . It is an altogether beautiful picture here revealed of this aged German poet—a picture of benignity, generosity, wisdom, and tranquillity which will captivate the reader, as it not only captured but firmly enchained the wedded pair of Craigenputtock."—New York Times.

EARLY LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. With Two Portraits. 12mo, $2.25.

"The whole picture of the man from his youth upward cannot be completely understood without a study of the present volume, and it therefore ought to be possessed by all those who have accumulated the other volumes which have attempted to throw light upon the career of Thomas Carlyle."—Christian Advocate.

"The letters are full of human interest, warm with sympathy and affection—just such letters as a young man of good breeding and a kind heart, of brilliant, though of somewhat erratic genius, might be expected to write to those whom he loved and who loved him. They are, indeed, remarkable letters, viewed in whatever way; entirely unconventional, and never commonplace; instinct with wit, and wisdom, and wholesome good cheer."—New York Observer.

"We are enabled to see the genesis of his great talents, and the transformations they wrought on his character; the difficulties, doubts, and forebodings which he encountered; the sturdy simplicity of his home relations; and, through all, the firm, unalterable confidence in his own destiny as a leader among men. It is a significant, and even an inspiring narrative here unfolded."—Literary World.

The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1887.

The Week.

THE recent municipal elections in Philadelphia, in Cincinnati, in Chicago, and Milwaukee are all excellent illustrations of what can be done towards taking municipal government out of politics, as the phrase is, when the public is once fully awakened as to the necessity of it. From what has happened in the cities we have named, it seems as if we should owe this deliverance to the Socialistic element in the voting population. In Philadelphia, decent and intelligent men united at the last election to elect a good man by a large majority, for the purpose of trying the experiment of a really responsible Mayor under the new charter. In Chicago, also, the fear of seeing a gang of cut-throats and incendiaries put in power has led to the overthrow of the local demagogue and the installation in the mayoralty of a man of sense and character. In Milwaukee the contest turned on the election of judicial officers, and the Anarchist element is very strong, and the movement, to use the words of one leading citizen, "to throw politics to the dogs," in municipal affairs, is of very recent date; but it has proved effective in this instance. In Cincinnati the Labor party was not very formidable, as its managers seemed to be rational and clean-handed men, whose aims were not alarming. But its presence in the field sufficed to drive out of municipal politics the corrupt gang who have long figured in that city as the "Democratic party."

The fact that in both Philadelphia and Chicago the successful candidates were Republicans, of course gives an opportunity to the regular party organs like the New York Tribune to treat the result as a triumph for the Republican party; but nobody anywhere, and least of all on the scene of action, will be deceived by this. What we are witnessing is really the slow but sure perception by industrious people who own something and mean to support themselves by their labor, of the real nature of municipal government, and the extreme folly of sacrificing the comfort and even the safety of their own homes for wholly extraneous considerations. They begin to perceive, for instance, the immense humbug of voting against a candidate for Mayor because he is a free-trader and is supported by free-traders—as if mayors of cities could raise or lower the tariff—at the risk of putting in power people who believe in neither property nor police, nor law nor courts, and who look on those who save money out of their incomes as public enemies. They begin to see, too, that American cities have become too weighty an element in the social peace and business prosperity of the country, to be allowed any longer to be used as a football by politicians.

The passage of the High-License Bill by the New York Senate by a nearly solid Republican vote, all the Democrats voting against it, makes the Republican record on this most important measure complete and unassailable. Only two Republican Senators sided with the Democrats, Coggeshall, the notorious jobber from Utica, and "Jake" Worth, another notorious jobber from Brooklyn. These two belong to precisely the same class of Republicans as do "Charlie" Smith of New York and "Johnny" Reitz of Brooklyn, the two Republican Assemblymen who voted against the bill. They are Republicans only for business reasons. They trade and deal themselves into office, and, once in, they trade and deal in all cases for their personal benefit and against the public interests. Whenever they are brought squarely to book, they are found to be on the side of the liquor power or some other of the evil influences in politics. What the Governor will do with the bill, remains to be seen. Nobody has asked him to veto it save the liquor-dealers, and Tammany and Irving Halls, which are the representatives of the liquor-dealers in politics. Not a single respectable newspaper of any party in this city ventures to lift its voice in opposition to the bill.

The widespread determination to place effective restraints upon the liquor traffic is freshly illustrated in the passage through the Massachusetts House, by a vote of two to one, of a bill, in which the Senate is expected to concur, limiting the number of licenses which may be granted in any place to one for every 500 people; an amendment to allow Boston one for every 250 of population being rejected, 132 to 66. Boston now has one saloon to 158 inhabitants, so that the proposed law would reduce the number in that city by more than two-thirds. Lawrence beats Boston with one saloon for every 141 people, while there are places of only a few thousand inhabitants apiece which now have a saloon for every 175 or 200 people. The steady growth of temperance through voluntary action, which is as noteworthy as the development of legal measures to restrict drunkenness, is also freshly illustrated in Massachusetts. The staff officers of the first brigade of the State militia have unanimously voted not to carry any intoxicating drinks of any kinds to camp this year, and not to permit the drinking of such liquors in their tents during the encampment.

It would be difficult to decide which side of the wrangle between Gov. Hill and the Republican majority in the Senate is the more partisan and disgraceful. The Senators have for four years or more pursued the absolutely indefensible course of "hanging up" appointments, because to confirm them would be to put Republicans out of desirable offices. They are, in fact, if not usurping the Governor's power of appointment, completely nullifying his exercise of it. They are doing this mainly to keep in office Tom Platt's Quarantine ring of officials, whose terms expired four and five years ago, and who are holding their positions because no successors have been confirmed. If they give way and confirm appointments for other offices, they will have no excuse for holding their party solidly against confirming nominations for new Quarantine officials; so they make and keep a caucus decision to refuse to confirm any nominations. It is an abuse of their confirming powers so gross that not a Republican newspaper in the State ventures to attempt any defence of them. The Governor, on his side, knowing that no matter what nominations he makes they will not be confirmed, is improving the opportunity to make himself "solid" with the Labor agitators by sending in names of men who have no fitness for the office to which they are nominated, and no claim to it save that Walking Delegates of the Quinn type have asked for their appointment. It is a humiliating spectacle which the people of the first State in the Union are thus called upon to contemplate—a Democratic Governor and a Republican Senate using public office as if it were a game of dice.

The ignorant youths who puff the Field Code in the newspapers talk as if, after the code was adopted, their venerable employer was going to live on indefinitely and superintend its emendation, and see that no sacrilegious or ignorant hands were laid on it. They forget that he must in the order of nature shortly leave us, and that after he has gone the work of revision is sure to begin, not at the hands of jurists, but at the hands of the Legislature, which, having for the first time in Anglo-Saxon history, got hold of the whole law embodied in a statute, would undoubtedly proceed to treat it like other statutes—or, in other words, to tinker it at every session. Bills "to amend the Civil Code," in aid of jobs, in aid of private claims, disputes, and interests of all sorts, would appear in showers every winter at Albany, and they would be introduced in greatest numbers by the worst men. In fact, a civil code in the form of a statute in this State would be the greatest field ever opened in this country to legislative "strikers," for the simple reason that in no other State are the interests which the law defines and protects so vast, varied, and complicated, and so sensitive to legislative disturbance. Of course we should have to rely on the lawyers to give warning of the effects of these changes in the Code. In nine cases out of ten they would not be at first perceptible to the layman's eye. We should also have to rely on the lawyers to expose and resist them, but nothing is more certain than that this would soon prove a vain reliance. Lawyers, like other people, grow weary of rendering thankless and bootless service. They would in this case grow weary all the sooner, because a large body of them would find their account in the disorder and uncertainty which the annual "revision" or "emendation" would produce, and would reconcile themselves to what they profited by, as many do already to the corruption of legislative bodies.

The bar of New Jersey has never received a greater shock than the one which Gov. Green has given it in refusing to reappoint Chancellor Runyon, and in elevating to the Chancellorship a Jersey City lawyer who in experience, reputation, and ability is ranked by scores of lawyers in all parts of the State. Under the legal system of New Jersey the Chancellor is undoubtedly the most important officer in the State, not even excepting that of Governor. His authority over corporations and estates is far reaching, and, as the Presiding Judge of the Court of Errors and Appeals, he has to pass upon the arguments of the leading members of the State bar. Every interest is therefore to be congratulated when a man can be found for the position who is universally recognized as fulfilling all its requirements. Such a man was Chancellor Runyon. Members of the bar felt it an honor to appear before him. The justness of his decisions was not questioned, and his great learning and keen aptitude for despatch enabled him always to keep up with the business of his court. It would have been considered an outrage to displace such a man because he was not of the same political party as the Governor. How much more startling, then, is the outrage when the great jurist, belonging to the Governor's political party, is displaced because he is not in sympathy with the Governor's particular faction! It does not do to say, in a case like this, that the successor, even if young and inexperienced (it is said that he has never had but one case before the Court of Errors), is honest and bright, and "will learn." The simple fact is that a great wrong has been done to vast public interests, and a wrong that should not be forgotten when opportunity comes to condemn it at the polls.

It is a gratifying coincidence that at the very time when Tennessee displays the good effects of the rejection of the scheme of Federal aid for education, by more than doubling the amount of the State appropriation for the public schools as soon as Congress had adjourned, Louisiana exhibits the advantages of the rejection of another scheme of Federal aid to the States. Before the war the Mississippi River States used to keep up an effective system of levees for protection against the spring floods. After the war Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi set up the plea that they were too poor to maintain the levees, and that the nation must come to the rescue. For years attempts were made to commit the Federal Government to this policy by inserting in the annual River and Harbor Bill appropriations for levees. Fortunately they failed, and at length, instead of folding their arms and complaining that they were "impoverished by the war," the people interested set to work on their own account. State Boards of Commissioners were created in districts lying along the river, which proceeded to levy a tax on every bale of cotton raised within the district, the proceeds to be used in building and repairing levees. This tax has just been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, and the policy will be extended. The districts issue bonds for the purpose, and interest and principal are paid out of the cotton tax levied for that purpose. The New Orleans Times-Democrat says that "in this way a sum sufficiently large can be realized to assure the construction of a perfect system of levees in the Fifth Louisiana District," and the same thing is, of course, true as to other districts. Thus the States will get a good levee system, as they are getting a good school system, by their own efforts, without the demoralizing consequences which would have followed had the schemes which presented them as mendicants not fortunately failed.

A Western State and Territory have just escaped, through the veto of the Executive, a curse from which Louisiana suffers. The Arizona Legislature passed an act legalizing a gaming corporation whose business was to be the distribution of prizes by a game of chance, to be conducted under the supervision and guarantee of the Territory; the bribe being the offer of part of the profits for the public-school fund and the erection of public buildings. But Gov. Zulick vindicated President Cleveland's selection of him by returning the bill with a veto which killed it, on the ground that he was "unwilling to aid in the legalization of a gambling scheme, by which the earnings of men, women, and even children can be seduced to investment in lottery tickets, to build up the fortunes of a few interested stockholders at the expense of public morals, under the pretext of replenishing the public-school fund; preferring that our public schools, in the future as in the past, should be maintained by the free, honest offerings of the people, rather than our children should be educated from the overflowing profits of a system of legalized gambling, which in my judgment is subversive of every sense of political morality." The Nevada Legislature at its recent session gave fresh proof of the folly of making a State out of a little mining camp by passing an act for the formation of a corporation modelled after the Louisiana Lottery [Company; but Gov. Stevenson defeated the scheme by interposing his veto, on the ground that the bill was in conflict with the Constitution.

It is to be hoped that some compromise of the debt of Virginia may result from the conference proposed by the Legislature between a commission for the State and a commission representing the foreign bondholders. If, however, the intention of the State commissioners is to give up nothing on their side, but merely to demonstrate to the creditors that the debt cannot be paid, they must have more than Southern hopefulness to expect success. It would certainly be impossible to convince any disinterested expert that the State cannot pay the debt. Let Virginia fund it at a low rate of interest to run for a long term, and she can bear it perfectly well. It is of little use to make complaint about poverty in the Southern States at this time. Their material resources are too great, have been too widely advertised, and have too deeply impressed Northern men and Englishmen to leave a chance for removing that impression. Maine raised last year just about the same amount of taxes as Virginia, and the rate per 100 was exactly the same. Yet if you were to tell a Virginian that Maine was as rich as the old Dominion, he would treat you with contempt. Virginia is undoubtedly a hundred fold richer than Maine in natural resources, but those resources are almost totally undeveloped. She is in a position, therefore, to find it of peculiar advantage to fund her debt for a long term, knowing that she will be richer each year, so that the longer the term of the debt, if it lowers the interest, the better. But to expect creditors to fund under the Riddleberger Act at this stage of the case is a most extraordinary exhibition of hopefulness in a very hopeful race. It is doubtful whether the Legislature has any figures to offer that the creditors are not perfectly well acquainted with, and certainly no State officer knows any more about the resources of the State than many an expert making investments for foreigners there. The conference, which is to take place not later than April 12, will be awaited with great interest.

The rumor that the Republican managers contemplate making Mahone Chairman of their National Committee in next year's campaign seems hardly credible, and yet it would be only the logical carrying out of the Massachusetts theory that what the party needs is management, and not principles. Mahone is probably the best—which is the same thing as to say the worst—manager in the country, and his Chairmanship of the Republican National Committee would be a natural outcome of a system which proposes to revive the party by clubs and "organization."

The "Labor" news of the day gives us some amusing glimpses of the kind of world it will be when we are all ruled by master workmen and walking delegates. A delegation from District Assembly 49 has been at Albany, we are told, urging the appointment of a certain Hanley as Commissioner of Labor Statistics. Hanley, it appears, was a grocer who failed in business in Jersey City and then took up the cause of Labor. He was sent on a mission to the Southwest strikers last year. After his return he took care of furniture for Bernard Maguire. When he is travelling for Labor he is called "Martin A. Austin"; but when he is a candidate for office as a statistician, he is called "Martin B. Hanley." In the Bureau of Statistics, he would doubtless upset the old capitalistic adage, that "figures do not lie," and make them lie handsomely for Labor and Hanley, or Labor and Austin. We regret to say that Timothy Quinn, alias "Putnam," who headed the 'longshoremen's strike, after having driven a hack in winter and an ice-cart in summer, has fallen from power, and is now in a private station. He is open to offers from hack proprietors and ice companies, and can be seen at Pythagoras Hall, where he is still, when not otherwise employed, making a stand against capital. Give him a call.

Labor gave a benefit performance on Sunday night in the Windsor Theatre, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to workingmen who are in want because of the failure of the longshoremen's strike. There were about 800 persons present, and the programme was long and edifying. Quinn—not the ex-ice-cart driver and ex-hackman, but the other Quinn, who is Master Workman of District 49—made a speech in which he said that the press alone was responsible for the failure of the strike, and was reponsible also for the "continuation of the differences between capital and labor." He was also of the opinion that the "press must alter its position towards organized labor in America." Then Mr. Powderly remarked that, humble though he might be, he regarded his position as head of the Knights as "second to none on earth," and believed District 49 to be the "grandest of organizations to-day," though he was willing to admit that any one going to the District's meetings and expecting to find angels there, would be disappointed. After this intellectual portion of the programme the "Old Oaken Bucket" and "Song for the Weary" were sung by a double quartet, and then some sketch artists appeared and drew portraits of Blaine, Butler, and Powderly. These were subsequently sold at auction, when Powderly fetched $3, Blaine 75 cents, and Butler 25 cents. This part of the proceedings was carefully edited out of the Sun's report.

The recent resignation of Judge Samuel Treat of St. Louis and the death of Judge Samuel H. Treat of Springfield, Ill., create two new vacancies on the Federal bench to be filled by a Democratic President. The Treats, oddly enough, considering the close approach to absolute identity in names, were judges of the District Court in adjoining districts, Samuel having served on this bench for 30 years and Samuel H. for 32 years, the latter having been also for 16 years a State Judge before his promotion to the Federal court. Samuel H. was appointed by Franklin Pierce on March 3, 1855, and Samuel by Pierce just two years afterwards, on the last day of the latter's term, March 3, 1857. Two of Buchanan's appointees, R. R. Nelson of Minnesota (June 1, 1858), and Matthew P. Deady of Oregon (March 9, 1859); another of Pierce's, James M. Love of Iowa (February 21, 1856), and even one of Millard Fillmore's, Ogden Hoffman of California (February 27, 1851), are still on the District bench. Except these few remaining relics of Democratic appointments to the Federal bench before the war, every present member of the United States Supreme Court (nine in number), the Circuit (nine), and all but five of the District Courts (fifty-eight), hold the commissions of Republican Presidents, although it is true that one, Field, of the Supreme bench, has turned Democrat since his appointment by Lincoln. As five of the nine Supreme Court judges are past sixty-seven years of age, one of them being in his seventy-fifth year, and as several of the members of the two lower courts are suffering from age or infirmity, it is probable that, in the course of nature, a number of vacancies must occur within a comparatively short period, to add to the five on the District bench which have been filled since March, 1885, and the two new ones just created.

The Boston Advertiser actually makes the Rev. Joseph Cook the subject of a leading article, in which it resents bitterly and with solemnity his declaration that he is not personally acquainted with any of the present editors of that journal, and defends its own dictum that Cook had been "flat, stale, and coarse" in a lecture of his on Henry Ward Beecher. The continued tendency of the Boston mind to occupy itself with Cook and to take his scientific, literary, and religious charlatanry seriously, is one of the oddest intellectual phenomena of the day. The Boston correspondent of the Hartford Courant, a very intelligent observer, says that the public of that city is at last getting weary of him. The elaborate editorial self-defence of the Advertiser looks, however, as if he were taking too hopeful a view of the situation, and as if Cook still weighed on people's minds.

It would redound to the credit of the country and to the benefit of the Irish if the resolutions which State Legislatures are passing, protesting against the Irish coercion bills, were draughted by men of sense and education. Waiving the question of propriety—which on such an occasion many people will think a small matter—it remains highly desirable that American expressions of disapprobation of British legislation should be expressed in such a manner as not to excite the ridicule and contempt of the persons to whom they are addressed.

There is not much importance in the division on the Coercion Bill in the House of Commons on Friday. It is a very unusual thing to oppose the first reading of a bill, but the Opposition has done it in this case simply in pursuance of the policy of resistance à outrance which had been determined on, when Parliament met, as regarded all attempts at coercive legislation for Ireland. It is usually on the second reading that an opposed bill has to fight for its life before it goes into the Committee of the Whole. Consequently it is probable that some Unionists voted with the Government who will hesitate about doing so on the second reading, partly because they see no good reason for departing from the old usage in this case, and partly because they dislike to ford streams before they come to them. Many of them are doubtless hoping that before the moment comes when they will finally have to place themselves on record for or against coercion, something will happen to deliver them from their dilemma—the bill will be modified, or the Ministry will retreat, or the new Land Bill will come well to the front, and take the sting out of the Crimes Bill, and so on. Consequently, there is a strong chance that the Ministry will not have the majority for the second reading they have had for the first, or a large enough one to save the bill from serious if not fatal mutilation in the Committee, when it will be attacked clause by clause. The situation is, in fact, for halting Unionists one of great perplexity. The bill is a much worse one than the Tories first talked of. It has been received with unexpected indignation by the Liberal press, and particularly the provincial press, and it is feebly presented and supported in the House of Commons. Neither Chamberlain nor Hartington can defend it with fire or vigor; Goschen has long ceased to be considered a Liberal at all; and Smith and Balfour have little debating value.

Of the worthlessness for any purpose of a measure of this kind introduced under the closure, and opposed as this one is likely to be, there can hardly be a question in the mind of any intelligent and impartial observer. All previous coercion bills for Ireland have had all England and Scotland behind them, and were supported by, if not a majority, a considerable portion of the Irish members Even with this moral and political backing, however, they have generally been only half executed, and have never secured either peace or order any more than content. The notion that one like this, which half the English and nearly the whole of the Scotch members are opposing with fierce indignation under the leadership of the greatest English statesman, and against which the most powerful portion of the English press is thundering, can ever be carried into effect, or can, in fact, result in anything but an increase of disorder, and frightful conflicts between the people and the police, is almost ridiculous. The mere opposition it will meet with in the Commons and the country will kill it for all practical purposes.

The latest turn in the manœuvres of the men who control Mexican affairs, and who are seeking some constitutional means of giving President Diaz another term, is the proposal to amend the Constitution so as to allow re-election. The advocates of the prorogation scheme, to which we recently referred, are still in the field, the Legislature of Oaxaca, Diaz's State, having followed up the action of Puebla by an emphatic endorsement of the plan to prolong the Presidential term; but the plainly retroactive nature of such a measure has crippled it from the start. Meanwhile, the bolder and more thorough plan of striking out of the Constitution the prohibition of electing for successive terms has been finding enthusiastic promoters, one prominent Deputy having publicly announced his adhesion to the idea, and his intention to move the needed amendment at the April session of Congress. The startling inconsistency of allowing Gen. Diaz to do in 1888 what he plunged the country into civil war to prevent Lerdo from doing in 1876, is something of an obstacle to the proposal, but it would be eminently Mexican to regard it as only trivial. The President himself has given no public intimation of his wishes, and is doubtless willing to let popular opinion express itself upon the various projects. If he could peacefully secure the succession to Romero Rubio, his father-in-law and present Secretary of the Interior, it is probable that he would prefer that way out of the difficulty. In any case it is certain that the coming session of Congress will have this question of the next Presidency under serious if not exciting discussion.

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, March 30, to TUESDAY, April 5, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

MR. CHARLES S. FAIRCHILD, who was Acting-Secretary of the Treasury during Mr. Manning's absence from his post, was appointed to succeed Mr. Manning on March 31, and Mr. I. H. Maynard, who was Second Comptroller of the Treasury, succeeded Mr. Fairchild as Assistant Secretary.

The President has appointed Martin V. Montgomery of Michigan, who has been Commissioner of Patents, to be Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to succeed Justice McArthur, retired.

The act of the last Congress granting land in severalty to Indians was first put into effect on March 31, when the President ordered the allotment of land under this law to the Indians on the Warm Spring Reservation in Oregon.

The Secretary of the Navy on April 1 opened the plans which had been submitted for an armed cruiser and a powerful battle-ship, and found that designs had been offered by the Thames Iron-Ship Building and the Barrow Ship-Building Companies of England, A. H. Grandjean of France, Capt. N. S. Clayton of New Zealand, Lieut. W. I. Chambers, T. D. Wilson (Chief of Bureau of Construction), and S. H. Pook of the United States Navy, N. L. Tonns of New York city, and F. L. Norton of Washington. Fifteen thousand dollars will be paid for every design that is accepted.

The new Government dry-docks, the construction of which was authorized by the last Congress, will be built at the Brooklyn and Norfolk Navy-yards.

The members of the Inter-State Commerce Commission went to Washington on April 1 and took the oath of office. Committees from several Southern cities have made statements to the Commission that such a change of freight rates as it is supposed will have to be made by roads leading from the South northward will do great injury to Southern manufacturers, most of whose products are now transported at "special" rates. The great railroad lines have made and published new schedules of freight and passenger rates, to take effect on April 5, in accordance with the provisions of the law which forbid special rates and free passes. Mr. Cooley has been chosen chairman of the Commission.

A decision was handed down April 5 by the Supreme Court of the United States, which declares that no unconstitutional or illegal discrimination is made against the national banks by the tax system of this State.

In the United States Circuit Court at Boston an opinion has been given denying the motion of the Bell Telephone Company, in the case of the Government against it, to plead the results of previous litigation, in addition to being allowed to demur to the whole bill. This will enable the Government's suit, which was ruled out of court in Ohio, to proceed.

In a decision handed down by the Supreme Court of Connecticut on April 1, the law prohibiting threats of injury to property was construed to include the boycott. The accused persons were convicted of conspiracy to boycott the proprietors of the New Haven Courier because they would not discharge non-union printers. It is held in the decision that "the purpose of conspiracy, or the means by which it was to be accomplished, or both, were not only unlawful, but, as some authorities express it, 'was in some degree criminal.'"

An election was held in Michigan April 4 on an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the sale of liquor, which was defeated by a majority of about 5,000. Two Judges of the Supreme Court, James V. Campbell and Charles D. Long, and two Regents of the University, R. W. Butterfield and Charles Hebard, all Republicans, were elected, by majorities ranging from 8,000 to 12,000. On the same day municipal elections were held in the cities and towns of Ohio. In Cincinnati Armor Smith, Republican, was elected Mayor. He received 17,963 votes; Stevenson, the Labor candidate, 17,367; Matson, Democrat, 11,951. At Columbus Philip Bruck, Democrat, was elected by 1,134 plurality. For the four preceding years the Mayor has been a Republican. A Republican Mayor was elected in Toledo. In Cleveland a Democratic Mayor succeeds a Republican. In Chicago, on April 5, John A. Roche, Republican, was elected Mayor. The Democrats had no candidate, and the Labor candidate received 23,410 votes out of 74,768. In Wisconsin H. W. Orton, Democrat, was elected Judge of the Supreme Court. Municipal elections were held in Kansas on the same day, when the new law allowing women to vote for municipal officers went into effect. In some towns the female vote was large, in others insignificant. The noteworthy features of these April election returns are the large vote polled by the Labor party in Cincinnati, the narrow defeat of prohibition in Michigan, and the breach of old party lines shown by the returns in many towns in Ohio.

Gov. Beaver of Pennsylvania has issued a proclamation fixing April 22 as Arbor Day, and he has requested the people generally, and school children in particular, to plant trees.

Ten members of the Virginia Legislature have been appointed as Commissioners on the part of the State to meet the representatives of the foreign holders of the State's bonds to agree upon a plan of settlement of the debt.

The new liquor law in Maine has gone into effect, and it is the most radical effort that has been made to suppress the sale of liquor. It provides that any person selling any intoxicating liquor in the State contrary to law shall be fined $50 and costs, and in addition thereto imprisoned thirty days for the first offence, and, in default of payment, imprisoned thirty days additional; and for each subsequent offence he shall be fined $200 and costs and imprisoned six months, with six months' additional in default of payment. Any clerk or agent who aids or assists in violating the law in any manner is held alike guilty with the principal. A common seller is subject to a fine of $100 and thirty days' imprisonment. On a second and every subsequent conviction the penalty is a fine of $200 and costs and four months' imprisonment. If a man is found intoxicated in the street he is to be fined not more than $10 or imprisoned thirty days for the first offence, and for each subsequent offence for thirty days.

The Legislature of Texas has passed a bill to carry into effect a section of the State Constitution prohibiting the consolidation of parallel or competing railroads. It fixes a penalty of $1,000 to $4,000 fine and imprisonment of managers or agents of companies that violate the law.

Great suffering, caused by drought, is again reported from Atascosa County, Texas. A petition for aid sent to the Legislature sets forth that more than 100 persons are at the point of starvation, and that their neighbors are so destitute as not to be able longer to relieve them.

One of the Chinese festivals fell on last Sunday, and great numbers of Chinamen in San Francisco placed meat offerings and burned joss-sticks on the graves. It is estimated that as many as 2,000 corpses will be exhumed and sent back to China this spring from San Francisco—a custom that they hold to firmly, except in the case of converts to Christianity.

The Hotel del Monte, at Monterey, Cal., was burned on the night of April 1. Three hundred people lost their clothes and baggage. The hotel belonged to the Southern Pacific Railway Company, and was one of the handsomest at any seaside resort in the United States.

The Missouri Pacific Railroad Company has decided to build a manufacturing village on the outskirts of St. Louis after the plan of Pullman, near Chicago. Its shops will be located there, and homes for workmen will be built near by and owned by the company.

An association of iron founders in St. Louis (employers) has made "an injury to one the concern of all." The moulds of a firm whose men have struck have been distributed among the foundries of the other members of the association, who will thus enable the suffering firm to fill its orders.

Messrs. George William Curtis, Carl Schurz, Wayne McVeagh, Charles J. Bonaparte, Charles R. Codman, Charles C. Adams, and William Potts, who were appointed by the National Civil-Service Reform League a special committee to prepare a report on "the present condition of the reform movement and the relations to it of the national, State, and municipal administrations," published their report on March 30. They say: "Tried by the standard of absolute fidelity to the reform as it is understood by this League, it is not to be denied that this Administration has left much to be desired." But they find that "the Administration, under enormous disadvantages and perplexities, has accomplished much for the reform of the civil service"; that "the old 'spoils system' has been seriously shaken," and that "the Administration has practically demonstrated that a clean partisan sweep of the civil service is not demanded by the intelligence of the country, and is not necessary for honest, efficient, and satisfactory government."

There is soon to be a drilling contest by militia companies from all parts of the Union at Washington. Because three companies of colored men have entered the contest the Montgomery (Ala.) Grays have withdrawn.

An express train on the Boston and Albany Railroad made a trip on March 30, lighted by electricity and heated by steam, and it was the first complete train so equipped which has ever been successfully run.

The subscription by citizens of Brooklyn to build a monument to Henry Ward Beecher has reached the sum of $7,000.

The sixty-second annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design in this city was opened to the public April 4, and will remain open until May 14. Of the 1,200 pictures offered, 503 were hung.

The books, statuary, bric-à-brac, and the like, which belonged to the late A. T. Stewart, fetched $49,422 at auction. This, added to the sum for which his pictures were sold, makes a total of $563,172—a smaller amount than was paid for these objects.

Mr. H. H. Hunnewell, a citizen of Wellesley, Mass., has presented the town with a hall, a park of ten acres, and a public library, with 6,000 volumes, the value of all which is estimated to be $250,000. Mr. William Bucknell of Philadelphia on his seventy-sixth birthday, March 31, gave to Bucknell University, at Lewisburg, $50,000. He has now given $142,000 to this institution.

The Rev. Dr. James Curran, formerly assistant to the Rev. Dr. McGlynn, the Catholic priest who has been deposed for the part he took in the Henry George campaign in this city, has been disciplined by the Archbishop of New York for sitting on the platform when Dr. McGlynn delivered a lecture on his deposition and the communal ownership of land.

John G. Saxe, the humorous poet, who for several years had been inactive, died at Albany March 31, aged seventy-one. On March 30 Thomas C. Reynolds, who had been Lieutenant-Governor of Missouri, committed suicide in St. Louis. John W. Harris, one of the oldest and most successful lawyers in Texas, died in Galveston April 1 at the age of seventy-nine. He was the first Attorney-General of the State. Joseph H. Bradley died at Washington on April 3, aged eighty-four. He was a son of the First Assistant Postmaster-General under the Administrations from Washington down to Jackson, and was for many years a well-known lawyer. Miss Catharine L. Wolfe of this city died April 4. She was very rich, and she gave much of her time and much money to works of charity, mainly through the Protestant Episcopal Church. It was she who paid the expenses of an expedition to Babylon, under the Rev. Dr. Ward, to promote researches in Biblical archæology. Her picture gallery is one of the most noteworthy in New York.

FOREIGN.

Immediately after the announcement of the Irish Coercion Bill the excitement began, which culminated at its passage on the first reading on April 1. On one side Mr. Morley, addressing the Liberal-Radical Union, called some of its features "grotesque and malignant," and they showed, he said, that the Government had no insight into the national sentiment of the Irish people. The responsibility for the tremendous plunge would rest upon a section of the Liberal party—a section which would henceforth be called the Coercionist-Radical party. He denied that the National League terrorized or coerced the people, and declared that the proposed suppression of the League would multiply the number of secret societies, and would deprive the tenant of his safeguard against the landlord. On the other side, Lord Hartington, at a meeting of the Liberal-Union members, declared that the Government had made the bill a question of confidence, and if the Liberal Unionists failed to support it, the result would be the advent of Mr. Gladstone to power.

On April 1, when the House sat for eleven hours, and rose at three o'clock the next morning, closure was applied to the Coercion Bill by a vote of 361 to 253, and it passed its first reading. The scene was one of the most extraordinary excitement ever known in modern Westminster. The turbulence began during the brief interval between the announcement of closure and the motion for the first formal putting of the motion. When it was put Mr. Gladstone walked in a stately fashion down the floor of the House to give his vote against it, and the Liberal and Irish members rose to their feet as one man and broke into wild cheers, and waved their hats with enthusiasm, and followed him. As they moved slowly towards the door, cries arose of "The rights of minorities," "Down with coercion," "We'll fight to the death," "Down with the Speaker." The result of the division having been formally declared, the Liberal and the Irish members, led by Mr. Gladstone, quitted the House in protest against the procedure. As they passed out they again indulged in loud cries, such as "A star chamber conspiracy," "Down with the Speaker." The Speaker, amid the terrible uproar, was powerless in his efforts to preserve order.

In an interview with the London correspondent of the Evening Post the day after the passage of the Coercion Bill, Mr. Gladstone said of the Conservatives: "They have thrust upon the Speaker a partisan function, and thus have dealt a blow at the Chair the gravity of which it is impossible to exaggerate." "It is not coercion I am thinking about, not dissolution, not home rule even," he added, "but the Chair, the Chair. Let them fight us. I have always said let them beat us. That is well. But above all things let them respect the Chair. But they have not. They have forced partisanship upon him. Besides this, nothing could exceed the contemptuous disregard of the Government for all forms of precedence and parliamentary procedure."

The principal speech against the Coercion Bill was made by Mr. Parnell, which has been pronounced one of the most vigorous he has ever delivered. Mr. Gladstone, who also spoke briefly, declared that he had never known a bill so completely torn to rags as Mr. Parnell had torn this one. Mr. Parnell declared that the bill meant a reign of judicial murders. It meant that all hopes of better times, which seemed dawning upon Ireland, would disappear; that a system of subornation of witnesses and wholesale perjury before partisan juries was to prevail, sending innocent persons to the scaffold and a convict's cell. What was the only state of society that could rise under this reign of terror? Secret societies would spring up, fostered by the sufferings of an oppressed nation, and those who had been persistent in counselling the people to observe patience and moderation might counsel in vain. But he would still counsel them to submit to injustice rather than retaliate or do anything that might drive Mr. Gladstone from their side, or increase his difficulties or place him in a false position with the Liberals. Their battle was now won in Ireland.

In almost every town in the kingdom meetings have been called to denounce the bill. Resolutions of protest from hundreds of places in England as well as Ireland have been adopted and published.

In the House of Lords Earl Cadogan, Lord Privy Seal, almost simultaneously with the presentation of the Coercion Bill, presented a land-bill which passed its first reading, providing for the purchase of Irish holdings, that is, for the abolition of the system of dual ownership created by the act of 1881. The lease holders whose leases expired prior to 1881, numbering 160,000, are to be admitted to the benefits of the act of 1881 in the same manner as those whose leases expired in that year. This bill is regarded by the Opposition as an effort to soften the Coercion Bill, and as an insincere proposal. It contains some measures for which Mr. Parnell has contended, but it is now bitterly opposed by the Liberals. The comment of the Daily News, which speaks for the Opposition, is that the bill "convicts the Ministry of the grossest inconsistency" because "it entirely dispenses with the necessity for coercion, or rather it would if the necessity existed"; and the News adds: "Mr. Balfour argues that an illegal combination prevents tenants in Ireland from paying their rents. Lord Cadogan formally admits that tenants are evicted for not paying impossible rents."

The second reading of the Coercion Bill was formally moved in the House of Commons April 5 by Mr. Balfour. Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Gladstonian, moved an amendment to the effect that "the bill would, if passed, increase the disorder in Ireland and endanger the Union and the Empire, and therefore should be rejected." The debate will be continued for some time.

A colonial conference, attended by representatives from all the most important British colonies, began its sessions in London on April 4, to discuss a wide range of subjects pertaining to colonial government and its relations to the home Government.

A new Italian Cabinet is at last announced, the ingoing members of which are Signor Depretis, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Signor Crispi Minister of the Interior, Signor Viale Minister of War, Signor Zanardelli Minister of Justice, and Signor Saracco Minister of Public Works.

While the Spanish Chamber of Deputies was in session April 2, a parchment case containing gunpowder, with a fuse attached, was found in the doorway of the President's bureau. An explosion later in the day broke the windows of the office of the Minister of Finance. Admission to the Parliament buildings has been denied to all journalists, native and foreign.

The last effort to kill the Czar—on March 29—was made by an officer of the army, who shot at him while he was taking exercise in the park of the palace at Gatchina. It is reported that a number of officers have been arrested for complicity in the plot. Three persons who were concerned in the previous effort to kill him have been hanged. The Russian Government has appropriated £25,000 to be used in unravelling the Nihilist conspiracy in Russia, and £12,500 for the same purpose in foreign countries.

A rich merchant of St. Petersburg was recently killed because he refused to contribute 80,000 rubles to the Nihilists' fund. Other rich Russians have received letters threatening them with immediate death if they do not give money to carry on the Nihilist warfare.

The Russian Government has declined to take part in the Exhibition to be held at Paris in 1889, and forbidden its subjects to send exhibits.

The Governments of Germany and Austria will imitate the action of the Government of Russia in declining to take part in the Paris Exhibition of 1889. The newspaper organs of these Governments insist that it would be an act of impropriety and an act of danger to the monarchies of Europe to do anything tending to glorify revolution.

Prince Bismarck was seventy-two years old on April 1. He received the congratulations of the Emperor and congratulatory telegrams from all parts of the empire and from many persons of distinction in other countries.

There has been a revival of sharp talk between German and French journals. The French press demanded that a German officer who obtained secret information in Paris be recalled. Thereto the Berlin Post replied on April 2 that if such a request were made by the French Government it could be answered only by the recall of the German Minister to France. The same paper accuses the French of having an organization of spies in Germany.

Prince Bismarck's newspaper organ, commenting on the conduct of Señor Mencarini, the Spanish Consul at Hong Kong, who at a recent banquet in that city toasted the prosperity of France, and expressed a hope that she would have a brilliant revanche, says: "Germany will not fail to make to Spain proper and weighty comment on the occurrence. Spain must not permit her diplomats to forget with culpable frivolity what is due to their position."

More indications have been given of Germany's determination to rule Alsace-Lorraine with great rigor. M. Antoine, a member of the Reichstag from Metz, was expelled from the province on April 1. He will be allowed to retain his seat in the Reichstag, but he must go to Berlin by way of Belgium or Switzerland, and not through France. Bismarck is reported to have said in a recent conversation: "We intend that the provinces (Alsace and Lorraine) shall remain incorporated with Germany. Their fortresses are a strong bulwark against France, and for us they have the advantage of removing by several days' march the starting point for an aggressive movement against us from France." Orders have been given by the German authorities to destroy the French flags preserved in the provincial townhalls.

The Belgian Chamber of Deputies has passed a bill permitting the Free Congo State to issue a lottery loan to the amount of 150,000,000f.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley wrote under date of March 9 from Cape Town that he had gone forward to rescue Emin Bey, whose supply of ivory, it is reported, was thought to be of no less than £60,000 value.

Trains on the Northern Division of the Intercolonial Railway in New Brunswick were hemmed in by snow for a week until April 1. Fifteen hundred passengers were snowed in on the tracks, and 1,500 workmen were engaged to dig a way out. In places the snow was thirty feet deep.

The Mexican Congress convened April 1. President Diaz, in his message, says that Mexico's relations with foreign Powers are of the most friendly character, and that with the United States there is no question pending which is likely to disturb the existing good understanding. As to the boundaries on the north, he insists that the Mexican Senate follow the example of the American Senate in extending the term for carrying the treaty regarding that matter into effect. The general tone of the message is satisfactory to the banking and financial interests. The assurance given of the ability of the Government to continue to meet all its obligations inspires fresh confidence.

SOME OF THE PRESIDENT'S HINDRANCES.

THE report of the Committee of the Civil-Service Reform League on the condition and progress of the movement under the present Administration has, we believe, impressed most people as exceedingly fair and impartial. It gives the Administration full credit for the good it has done, and makes full allowance for the obstacles in the way of doing better which it has inevitably encountered, some of which are doubtless much more formidable than Mr. Cleveland anticipated when he wrote his famous letter to Mr. G. W. Curtis and others. He has found that raising the standard of purity and efficiency was a much more difficult task in some States than in others, owing sometimes to the character of the party leaders, and sometimes to pre-existing political conditions which left any attempt at reform without local support. It was, in fact, not possibie for either Mr. Cleveland or anybody else to find out how the Democratic party stood towards civil service reform, without the actual experiment of a reforming Democratic Administration. During the ten years before 1884 large numbers of Democrats had persuaded themselves, and persuaded others, that they were in favor of the reform, without knowing very well what the reform was, or without picturing it to themselves as anything but the expulsion from office of all worthless Republicans, who constituted, as they flattered themselves, the great bulk of the office-holders. Nobody who has not had some personal experience of it can well realize what ignorance prevailed among political men, especially in the Democratic party, about the details of what was called "civil-service reform" down to the incoming of the present Administration. Few of them had ever taken the trouble to inform themselves about it, and a large number of those who did know something about it had not taken it seriously or looked on it as anything more than the fad of a body of Republicans, whose votes might be had for the Democratic candidate by humoring them judiciously.

Senator Gorman of Maryland probably stood in this latter category. He was a most useful and energetic man during the canvass, and, in fact, by the time it was over had probably laid the victorious candidate under weightier obligations than any other worker. That he had ever given civil-service reform any serious attention prior to the election, or had the least expectation of seeing it put into practice by Mr. Cleveland, may well be doubted. No sign of it had been discoverable in the management of the party in his own State, or in fact in the management of any party. When he found that the victory was won, therefore, he set about dividing the spoils, probably in as much innocence and as much ignorance of any reason why he should treat offices as public trusts, as any husbandman in the garnering of a crop which he had sown in toil; and, for the reasons we have above stated, he was a very difficult man for a Democratic President to gainsay.

Senator Gorman has, in fact, been shedding a flood of light on the situation in rather an amusing way, in an interview printed in the Baltimore Sun, and containing his view of the report of the Committee of the National League. To him the reason why the signers of the report have censured his doings in Maryland is simply that they are "intense Republicans," and favor "a centralized Government" and a permanent tenure in the civil service. The reason why he likes to make frequent changes in the civil service is not, as some people suppose, because he wishes to reward his henchmen, but because he is "opposed to centralization," and in favor of "government by the people" (of course, through Gorman) "in the broadest sense." "He thinks," he says, "that good government can only be secured through the people" (i. e., in Maryland, Gorman) "having the right and the opportunity to change their public servants high and low at all times within their [Gorman's] discretion." The Committee has denounced some of the appointments made in Maryland by "the people," alias Gorman; but the reason of this is, that they did not know "that he knew it to be necessary to select men who did not profess to be saints to ferret out the rascals whom they (the Republicans) appointed and kept in place."

There could hardly be greater simplicity, we see, than this. No reformer can get angry with a man like Mr. Gorman. When a great rascal appears in office in Maryland, we must not complain, because we do not know the workings, or, if we may say so, the secret purposes, of the Gorman mind. He did one very clever thing at the close of his interview, of which, however, the President is justly inclined to complain. He took up the list—which is a long one—of undeniably good appointments made in Maryland by the Administration, and claimed the credit of them all for his system of government by the people through Gorman. And he even maintained that he was a reformer himself. Nobody would ever guess what the reforms were in which he was engaged, so we will give them in his own words: "To protect the public domain and restrain the rapacity of corporations." It will be seen from all this that Mr. Gorman is really an interesting man, and belongs to a species which is rapidly growing scarce, owing to changes in environment. The natural-history museums will, therefore, do well to keep an eye on him.

GOVERNMENT ON BUSINESS PRINCIPLES.

THE appointment of Mr. Charles S. Fairchild as Secretary of the Treasury is a most notable extension of the system of conducting the affairs of the Government on business principles. The Treasury Department is a branch of the Government preëminently concerned with those features of administration which in any proper view are exclusively business-like in their nature—especially the collection of the money required to maintain the Federal Government, through the customs duties and the internal-revenue taxes, and the disbursement of this money through all the various avenues which it must pursue. A small army of officials, scattered all over the country, is demanded for the performance of this work, but the duties of nearly all these are purely fiscal in their nature and have properly nothing to do with politics. The head of the Department and a small number of other high officials are charged with the execution of the financial policy of the Administration for the time being, but the work of the great remainder, if properly discharged, has no more to do with financial policies than that of the subordinates in a great business firm. In other words, the Treasury is, of all the executive departments, the one which is by its very nature a business institution, to be conducted upon business principles.

Yet so thoroughly had the spoils system demoralized the public mind that until recently the Treasury Department has been considered the great patronage preserve of the Government. Only seven years ago the head of the Department made public proclamation that he conceived this to be the proper view of the institution, when he notoriously, and almost openly, employed men paid to serve the public in the enterprise of working up Sherman delegations to the Republican National Convention of 1880. Under Mr. Sherman's successor in 1881 the country saw the chief custom-house disorganized, and an efficient Collector of the same party faith with the new President removed in the middle of his term, solely to pay political obligations at the public expense. With such principles unblushingly avowed by heads of the Department, the whole service was inevitably infected, and it was managed throughout as a political machine.

There has seldom been a greater surprise than was afforded by the fact that it was a man of Daniel Manning's antecedents who called a halt in this matter. Mr. Manning had been educated in the same faith as to the disposition of the offices with his Republican predecessors, and when his appointment was foreshadowed, it was generally deprecated by civil-service reformers. But the test of time vindicated Mr. Cleveland's selection. Mr. Manning often yielded to the spoilsmen, and was frequently inconsistent, but when, early in his administration, he picked out that sincere reformer, Edward O. Graves, for Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing—the only great Washington office not under the Civil-Service Law—he asserted what proved the guiding principle of his course. Experience convinced Mr. Manning, against preconceived opinions, that the business system was the true system. His successor has nothing to unlearn. Mr. Fairchild has always believed in the merit system, and he was one of the earliest advocates of its application to the public service in this State. So far as his influence at Washington has gone (and it has gone far during the year that he has been virtually Acting Secretary), he has made the Treasury Department practically what it theoretically is—a great business institution. Even such partisan opponents as the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Press confess that he is "one of the genuine reformers of the Administration" (observe the unconscious admission that there are a number of such), and says that "in Department matters he has surprised all the old officials by sitting down as promptly on Senator Gorman and ex-Senator Barnum as he did on Eugene Higgins." Now that he is to be the unquestioned head of the Department, he will of course be still firmer in asserting himself. Mr. Fairchild is a man of very uncommon executive talent, and as under our system the Secretary of the Treasury is essentially only an executive officer, possessing none of the power of initiating legislation exercised by a Chancellor of the Exchequer in England, his selection is an exceedingly good one.

We have thus, for the first time since Andrew Jackson introduced the spoils system, the most important department of administration presided over by a man who hates the spoils system, and who will conduct the affairs of the Government on business principles. Already the Bureau of Engraving and Printing at Washington—formerly a loathsome sink of patronage—is upon a business basis; the same thing is true of the greatest custom-house in the country, and as true of those in Boston and many other cities besides New York; and Mr. Fairchild may be trusted to see that as speedily as possible the principles of the merit system shall be everywhere applied. To have a department, which was prostituted to the basest political uses in 1880 and 1881, firmly restored to business uses in 1887, is hardly short of a revolution.

Not less surprising and encouraging is the fact that the wiser leaders of the Democratic party have learned so much, since Mr. Cleveland's inauguration, that they endorse the choice of a genuine reformer for this position. The Washington correspondent of the Herald says that Speaker Carlisle and other equally representative Democrats were consulted by the President, and that "every one was content to see Mr. Fairchild placed at the head of the Treasury, and made the official head of the Department whose efficient actual head he has been ever since Mr Manning broke down." In other words, they saw that, in the present temper of the public mind, the best way for the Democratic party to strengthen itself with the country was to make proclamation of the fact that the Treasury Department was to be conducted by a proved reformer.

Such an incident brings out in strong relief the vast advance which has been made within three years. In 1884 the Republican party was running for the Presidency the man who was really responsible for the scandalous removal of Mr. Merritt and the appointment of Mr. Robertson as Collector in New York, and whose record assured his conduct of the Government upon a spoils basis. In 1887 a Democratic President appoints as Secretary of the Treasury a conspicuous civil-service reformer, with the approval of such prominent Democratic leaders as Speaker Carlisle.

INEFFECTIVE DEMAGOGY.

THE refusal on the part of the Legislature of Missouri to make appropriations for the militia is not merely an example of hostility to the forcible maintenance of law and order: it is a still better example of the childishness of such hostility. The militia already exists. It is in complete organization, officered, armed, clothed. The salaries of the officers are prescribed by law, and if the rank and file are called into active service, their pay is fixed; and, although they could not get their pay until money was appropriated for the special purpose, yet it would exist as a valid claim against the State, and refusal to pay men for the performance of an extremely disagreeable, not to say dangerous duty, would be likely to result in the election of a Legislature like the one of 1879, which showed its friendly feelings towards the militia by prohibiting the use of blank cartridges except on drill.

But even suppose the sentiment of hostility to the militia should dominate the Legislature for years, and appropriations should be withheld until the Missouri National Guard dies of inanition, what then? One of three things must happen in times of riot. The Governor of the State will be compelled to make requisition upon the President of the United States for national troops—a ludicrous result for those who hate military power—or the police must expand in numbers and increase in efficiency until it equals a militia in power, or else an irregular police or militia will be formed by the citizens, under the name of "regulators," "friends of law and order," or any of the names honest citizens are wont to take when the weakness or pusillanimity of their government has forced them to assume extraordinary powers. Order will be restored somehow, militia or no militia, police or no police, law or no law. This needs no proof. It is a settled fact in the history of civilized communities. If a Governor like the present incumbent in Missouri should be as slow in making requisition for United States troops as he was in calling out troops last year, and deputy-sheriffs should prove as ineffective, the right of individuals to combine in self-defence would surely be put to the test. Happily in Missouri this right is guaranteed by the State Constitution, for, although it may seem superfluous to preserve by law a right which will be assumed whether the law preserves it or not, it is, as a matter of fact, an immense assistance in the assumption of extraordinary powers to know that they may be assumed lawfully. For this reason the clause in the Constitution of Missouri which provides "that the right of the people to bear arms in self-defence and in defence of the lawful authority of the State cannot be questioned," might well become a rallying-point for the orderly elements of the State. The people may bear arms and may use them in self defence and defence of lawful authority. Nor is this right limited by the statute against carrying concealed weapons, for that makes an express exception in favor of carrying weapons in defence of person, home, or property. The Missourian who carries a weapon when threatened by such letters as the Knights of Labor sent the engineers and firemen of the Missouri Pacific Railroad last year, is acting under the law, and, what is more, is acting under a right which the Legislature could not take away from him.

But far more important than the right of self-defence is the right to bear arms in defence of the lawful authority of the State. This right, taken in connection with statutory provisions for suppressing riots by the civil authorities, renders it possible for the indignation of law-abiding citizens against mobs and rioters to take formidable and effective shape. Besides the usual authority vested in the mayor of any town or the sheriff of any county to call upon citizens to assist in suppressing a riot, and providing that the pay of citizens so employed shall be the same as that of militia in active service, there is another remedy, without waiting for the initiative from sheriff or mayor. If a large body of men are assembled in a threatening or riotous manner, a private citizen may give notice of it to the Mayor, a member of the Board of Aldermen, or Legislative Council of any city or town, or to a sheriff, coroner, or marshal, or any of their deputies, or to any justice of the peace. It is then the duty of the officer so notified to approach the rioters as nearly as he can with safety, and command them to disperse, and, if they do not comply, to command all bystanders to arrest them. Now, though the mayor of a city may refuse to do his duty, it would be strange if one decent man among all the officers enumerated could not be found, especially as a refusal to act after notice is visited with a fine not exceeding $500; and, the right officer once found, citizens armed to the teeth could accompany him for the constitutional purpose of defending lawful authority, and, when called upon by the officer to arrest rioters refusing to disperse, could use all due force to accomplish the arrest. If the citizens should kill or wound any of the rioters in their endeavors to make arrests, they would be held guiltless, while the death or injury of one of the citizens would make all the rioters answerable for it.

This method of suppressing a riot does not appear to be an impracticable one. When, during the Southwestern strike of last year, the large railroad yards in St. Louis were filled by the Knights of Labor on the pretence of protecting them, the corporation might have called upon a friendly justice of the peace to undertake the duty of warning them away, and might have sent armed Pinkerton men with him. If the Pinkerton men were citizens of the State, their right to bear arms in such a case "could not be questioned," and, if citizens of another State, the Constitution of the United States would clothe them with the privileges of citizens of the State. In this way, without the delay and difficulty of getting special police licenses, the corporation would obtain a disciplined force acting under law. Throughout the Southwestern strike the Knights showed a wholesome fear of coming into conflict with the authorities of the United States, undoubtedly because they had been taught by experience that the United States could legally use force, and would use it if necessary. A few trials against armed bodies of men acting under the State law would give them such a respect for its civil authorities that they would welcome back the militia with joy.

SENATOR DAWES ON THE CRISIS.

SENATOR DAWES addressed the Middlesex Club in Boston on Saturday afternoon. With much vigor and earnestness he "arraigned" everybody who had been derelict in promoting the commercial interests of the nation, and especially its foreign trade, and more especially its trade with the countries south of us. He did not confine the arraignment to the Democratic party. On the contrary, he took a broad, catholic view of the question, and ventured to predict that the next national election would be carried by the party which should offer the soundest platform of principles in regard to the reduction of the Treasury surplus and the extension of our commerce. New and profitable trade, he said, had been springing up among our sister republics on the American continent, but we were not getting it. Grand opportunities for the investment of capital had been opening in the Argentine Republic, but the great glutton, England, had monopolized them. She had also swallowed up the trade of Brazil and the west coast of South America, and even Germany had stepped in between us and the unratified treaty with Mexico, and, by means of a treaty of her own, had furnished a vantage ground for her own bankers and merchants in all the principal marts of that country. The contrast between those countries and our own in the commercial sense was shown in the startling fact that "of $420,000,000 of manufactures and other products such as we produce and are seeking market for, imported into those countries and consumed yearly, only about $30,000,000, or one-fourteenth part, come from the United States."

The Republican party, he continued, has been for a free ballot and a fair count, and for pensions for dependent soldiers, and "for a fair day's wages for a fair day's work," and for protection to American labor, and for honest money; but all this would not, in his opinion, suffice. It must meet the present crisis rather than past crises. What the nature of the present crisis is he did not explain, for, having led his hearers up to it with great intrepidity, he admonished them merely that the Republican party must give "a more vigorous and unflinching support to the new elements of political life and power brought into being by the new national conditions than these elements have yet received from any political party." A happy opportunity to connect the crisis and the remedy together was unfortunately lost, and we are left very much in the dark as to the Senator's notions of a method for lending a more vigorous support to the new elements of political life and power. We are only advised that European Powers, and especially England, are grabbing trade right and left which properly belongs to us, and that something must be done.

We think that Mr. Dawes has done remarkably well, and that if he were a member of a spelling-school, instead of the United States Senate, he would be very near the head of his class. A spelling-school does not require the exercise of the reasoning faculty, but only that of the memory. Mr. Dawes has a good memory for facts, and, if he improves his opportunities, he will no doubt be able to reason from cause to effect in commercial matters after a time. We propose now to give him one lesson, and the very simplest one we can think of, so that when he next addresses the Middlesex Club he need not leave his hearers gaping over the "new elements of political life and power," and wondering what they are and how they are to give them a more vigorous and unflinching support.

One of the chief products of the countries south of us is sugar, and of this we consume 2,500,000,000 pounds per annum. All but a small fraction of what we consume is imported from foreign countries, and mostly from the West Indies and South America. Sugar is selling now in the West India Islands at $1.65 to $1.80 per hundred pounds. The American duty on this kind of sugar ranges from $1.50 to $2.75 per hundred pounds. It would be quite within the limits of truth to say that the duty is upwards of 100 per cent. ad valorem. The lowest grade produced in these countries is the muscovado or brown sugar of our boyhood, which constituted the bulk of the sugar consumed in the United States not many years ago. The best quality is the straw-colored, crystallized article produced on the plantations by the centrifugal process, which is preferred by many consumers to the white sugar of our refineries. Now, for every cargo of sugar sent from those countries to the United States in the way of trade, another cargo of equal size and weight must be sent to pay the custom-house charges on the first cargo. This is an understatement of the truth. To put it in another way, which is equally an understatement, every time the American sewing woman, or other Prisoner of Poverty, takes a lump out of her sugar-bowl to sweeten her tea, the Government takes out another of the same size for itself. This way of stating it may be objected to as sentimental. We will, therefore, not pursue it, but confine ourselves to the commercial aspects of the case, which interest the Senator from Massachusetts. A duty of 100 per cent. on an article of food in universal use is as great an impediment to trade as it is a monstrosity in morals. We affirm that this duty has been and is now maintained in the interest of what Mr. Dawes calls "protection to American labor," that it is part and parcel of the great tariff combination and ring, in which sugar-planters, and wool-growers, and salt-boilers, and steel-rail makers, and a hundred other trades have conspired successfully to get the advantage of their fellow-citizens in the battle of life.

We have cited the sugar duties, not because they are more objectionable than other protective duties—they are in fact less objectionable than many others and less monstrous in the percentage imposed, the duty on salt, for instance, being more than 200 per cent.—we have taken them for illustration and comment upon Mr. Dawes's diatribe on the sad state of trade with the countries south of us. We offer in conclusion the single suggestion that a law which requires two equal cargoes of sugar to be grown, and manufactured, and shipped to the United States in order to get one cargo past the custom-house is a detriment and an obstacle to trade with the sugar-producing countries, which must put us at a disadvantage with any competing nation that follows a more enlightened and liberal policy.

SECONDARY AND HIGHER EDUCATION IN SWEDEN.

ALL who have sympathies upon either side of the irrepressible conflict between the friends and the opponents of classical education will find the recent educational history of Sweden highly interesting. Nowhere else, probably, has the subject received more general attention from people, press, and Government, and nowhere else has the reform spirit been more vigorous and aggressive than in Sweden. It is not altogether easy to make out from the chaos of conflicting opinions and theories the actual trend of enlightened public sentiment; nor is it quite certain that this trend, even if it could be made out with perfect certainty for Sweden, would help us much in casting the pedagogical horoscope of the world at large. It may be, as often happens, that the commotion made by the reformers is out of proportion to their real strength and influence. It may be, too, that certain steps recently taken will be retraced, and that the past few years have been simply a period of unrest which is destined to subside and leave matters substantially as they were before. On the other hand, the opposite contingency is not altogether improbable. It is at least possible that the little northern kingdom is only the leader in a movement which will in time greatly modify both the universities and the educational ideals of Europe. This possibility lends additional interest to recent Swedish experiments and discussions.

The history above alluded to has lately been written in condensed form by H. Klinghardt, a German teacher, who has been at the pains to make an exhaustive study of his subject from the documents. His work, a thick pamphlet of 168 pages, is entitled 'Das höhere Schulwesen Schwedens und dessen Reform in modernem Sinne.' The author is an uncompromising opponent of what he calls the "mediæval education," and writes throughout in the tone of a partisan rather than of a judge. But his partisanship does not appear to be of such a character as to affect his competency as an investigator. He gives the facts upon both sides even when they are such as to cause him pain. We can, therefore, well afford to thank him for his facts, even while cherishing our own opinion of his "tendency," which may be summed up in the motto he has chosen from an official report written in July, 1885, by Louis de Geer, Chancellor of the Swedish Universities. The words run in translation thus:

"I am of the opinion that modern culture is slowly but irresistibly detaching itself from its immediate connection with the language and literature of the ancients, and is at the same time taking up into itself new and indispensable elements. And I believe, further, that the scheme of instruction in the schools should be gradually transformed into harmony with this process of development."

The secondary schools of Sweden offer at the present time three different lines of instruction, which may be called, in the terms of our familiar, though somewhat unfortunate, American nomenclature, the classical, the Latin, and the scientific. Each of these lines, when complete, extends over nine years. Some of the schools do work upon but one line, others upon two only, while many (sixty in a total of ninety-five) are professedly more or less imperfect in their equipment, and do not attempt to continue the work of the common schools for more than two, three, or five years. Of the thirty-five schools which are "complete," the majority provide instruction in all three of the above-named lines. When, now, we have added that the Latin line is simply an eclectic course, recently introduced, in which Greek is replaced by English, it will be apparent that the typical preparatory school of Sweden is an institution which combines in one building and under one management the Gymnasium and the Realschule of the Germans. Such an institution receives a boy from the common school at the age of nine or ten, and graduates him at the age of eighteen or nineteen into the University or the Government School of Technology.

Upon any of the three lines of study the scholar has in his first year twenty-seven lessons per week; after that, either thirty or thirty-two. During the first three years he pursues simultaneously seven different subjects; after that eight, nine, or ten. During the first three years, also, the instruction is precisely the same upon all three lines, the divergence showing itself first in the fourth year, and becoming thereafter more and more marked. The scholar's weekly programme of lessons during these three years of uniformity is as follows: Religion, three lessons; Swedish language, five or six; German, six or seven; mathematics, four or five; natural science, two; history and geography, four or five; writing and drawing, three or two. From the end of the third year the instruction which is common to the three lines is as follows: Religion, two lessons weekly throughout the course; Swedish, four lessons weekly in the fourth year, three in the fifth, and two each year thereafter; history and geography, five lessons weekly in the fourth year, four in the fifth, and three each year thereafter. In his fourth year the scholar who plans to graduate upon the classical or Latin line takes up the study of Latin, of which he has then eight lessons per week for the next six years; his weekly pensum in German being at the same time diminished to four lessons in his fourth year, three in the fifth, and two in the sixth and seventh. After that he takes no more German. Of mathematics he has five lessons a week during his fourth and fifth years. Finally, in his fifth year he takes up French, of which he has either three or four weekly lessons for the next five years. In the sixth year the classical begins to diverge from the Latin line, the scholar upon the former taking up Greek, of which he has either seven or six lessons a week for the next four years. His pensum in mathematics also drops from five lessons to three, where it remains to the end. On the Latin line the scholar at the beginning of the sixth year takes up English, of which he has four weekly lessons during his sixth and seventh years, and two during the eighth and ninth. He has also somewhat more work in mathematics and in drawing than has the classical scholar. Of the scientific or "Real" line the characteristic features are these: English is taken up at the beginning of the fourth year, seven lessons a week being given to it in the fourth and fifth years, and three each year thereafter. In mathematics the scholar upon this line has five lessons during his fourth and fifth years, and seven thereafter. In natural science he has two lessons during his fourth and fifth years, thereafter six. Finally, he receives a little more instruction in French than is given on the other two lines.

From a pedagogical point of view the most interesting feature of this scheme of instruction is the prominent rôle played by the German language. It will be observed that in all three lines German is studied seven years, that it is pursued three years before any other language is taken up, and that during those years it constitutes the dominant study of the course. This arrangement is not due entirely to a conviction of the paramount importance of German in modern education, but in part at least to a theory that German rather than, for example, Latin, is the best "basis" for all future study in foreign languages. The plan has been in operation now for several years, and at a recent convention of Swedish school men at Jönköping, very general satisfaction was expressed with the results secured by this arrangement.

For the better understanding of all that this scheme of instruction signifies, and also of the reform projects that have lately been under discussion, a brief historical retrospect will be helpful. The law of 1859, which may be said to have given their characteristic form to the secondary schools of Sweden, provided that there should be two lines of instruction, a classical and a scientific, each lasting ten years. In the programme of instruction as determined by this law the two lines coincided during the first two years, and German, which was to be made the basis of subsequent language study, was begun in the second year. On the classical line Latin was taken up in the third year and pursued seven years, while Greek was begun in the fourth year and pursued six years. This state of affairs continued without important modification until 1869. The classical preparation was practically a sine qua non for admission to the universities. But by this time the world-wide agitation against the classics had begun to make itself strongly felt in Sweden, and in 1869, in obedience to the popular demand, a law was passed by which classical gymnasiasts were allowed to take English instead of Greek. This decree, which Herr Klinghardt thinks "worthy to be recorded with letters of gold in the history of pedagogy," gave rise to the third or Latin line above described. But the opponents of mediæval education did not stop here. In 1873 they brought it about that henceforth the study of Latin should be begun in the fourth year instead of the third, and that of Greek in the sixth year instead of the fourth. This last change was not universally consummated, however, until 1877. Subsequent efforts in the same general direction have been made, but thus far without success. Some of the reformers have not hesitated to announce as their programme the ultimate relegation of both the "dead" languages to the universities. But the majority have been disposed to content themselves, for the present at least, with much less radical proposals.

Before passing on to an account of these proposals, it will be of interest, perhaps, to see how the schools have been affected by this legislation. The following table gives the total number of students in the four upper classes (sixth to ninth years), in all the schools of the kingdom:

Year.	Classical Line.	Latin Line.	Scientific Line.
1873	1,746	642	349
1875	1,447	728	382
1877	1.261	1,035	670
1879	1,326	1,346	863
1881	1,408	1,652	944
1883	1,259	1,847	748

From these figures it appears that during the decade specified (later figures we have not at hand), the patrons of the classical line fell off by about one-third, while those of the Latin line trebled and those of the scientific line doubled. The universities still continue to exact Greek from students registering with the theological faculty, and from those who pursue philology with a view to becoming teachers. With this exception the graduates of the Latin course are admitted to all departments of the universities. Klinghardt is confident, more confident apparently than any positive indications seem to justify, that ere long Greek will quite cease to count as an element in general education, but will be looked upon as part of the professional training of preachers and philologists, and as such, like Hebrew and Sanskrit, relegated to the universities.

In 1881 a bill was introduced into the lower chamber of the Swedish Parliament recommending (1) that the "preliminary" examinations in Latin at the universities be discontinued; (2) that instruction in Latin in the secondary schools begin in the sixth year and continue four years; (3) that an optional course in Latin, not to exceed four lessons a week, be introduced in the last four years of the scientific line. The "preliminary" examination referred to in (1) is usually held at the end of the students' third semester of residence, when he is ready to enter upon his special professional course. It is a somewhat severe examination, and is required of all students. To drop it would mean practically the opening of the university to graduates of the scientific line. The second recommendation contemplated a further abridgment of the time given to Latin, and the third was evidently intended to make the Latin line unnecessary, and so to pave the way for its discontinuance. These propositions were debated in Parliament at great length. The reports of the numerous speeches pro and con, as condensed by Klinghardt from the archives, and the picture he is able to present of the representatives of the Swedish people sitting from half-past seven until midnight on two successive days, carrying on a warm and able discussion of such questions as these, and doing so in the evident conviction (several times expressed in words) that the eyes of the nation were upon them—all this is calculated to awaken curious emotions in the breast of an American. The result of the debate was that the bill was carried by a vote of 85 "moderns" to 38 "mediævalists." The bill as passed was then turned over to the first chamber, where it was defeated by a vote of 72 to 36.

Connected with the recommendations of the second chamber was a request to the Ministry for the appointment of a royal commission, whose duty it should be to investigate the whole subject of higher education in Sweden, and to make such recommendations as the emergency might seem to require. This Commission was constituted in 1882, and went zealously to work. It consisted of fourteen members, ten of whom were teachers either in the schools or in the universities. The report of the Commission, in four volumes, was handed in in midsummer, 1884. It recommended, among many other things, that the preliminary examination in Latin should require from students of law and medicine, also from students of economics and of many other subjects taught in the philosophical faculty, only a rudimentary knowledge of the grammar and an amount of previous reading equal to one book of Cæsar. This modicum of Latin they proposed to have furnished by the schools on the scientific line. On the other hand, they recommended that the Latin line be dropped, and that on the classical line there be no diminution of the time given to Latin and no exemption from Greek. The theory of this recommendation was to strengthen the classical line intensively while weakening its prestige, by causing it to be known as the special propædeutic of preachers and philologists, and advertising the scientific line as the proper thing for a general education.

On the reception of this report in 1884, it was at once transmitted to the universities and the "consistories" (a name given to the educational council of a diocese). These took several months to consider the matter, and then, by large majorities, returned an emphatic negative to all the essential recommendations of the Commission. The Chancellor of the Universities, De Geer, whose opinion was likewise asked, took intermediate ground between the schools and the Commission, making some concessions to the prejudices of each. But his real attitude can doubtless be divined from the words quoted from him at the beginning of this article. And thus matters rest at the present time. There is reason to suppose that another attempt will be made by the partisans of reform to secure legislation in their interest from the present Parliament.

BRADFORD'S INDEX TO CLEMINCIN'S COMMENTARY ON DON QUIXOTE.—II.

YALE COLLEGE, March 26, 1887.

WERE we to go on following the alphabet the result would be a pamphlet, and we close after some remarks on two other passages to which attention was called in our previous review of 'Don Quixote' (Nation, Dec. 17, 24, 1885).

Duelos y quebrantos.—Spaniards are extraordinarily fond of epithets and insinuations which require a dictionary to explain them, and which they almost never do. For instance, [asomar] por los cerros de Úbeda, [to peep] over the hills of Úbeda, is a strong antiphrasis—point du tout—because (why don't Clemencín explain it?) Úbeda is situated on a sharp bluff in the midst of a wide plain, hence cannot be looked over. So they say, "Yes, I'll do that, as [sure as peep] over the hills of U.," meaning "I won't do it at all."

Now, for their dishes they had three humorous epithets. One was a "duelos y quebrantos" meal, meaning "sorrows and wailings" (quebranto never means material breaking, only a moral one), to be eaten on one of their meagre days, made up of a boiled lamb's head with the brains, as the Lazarillo de Tormes informs us (1553), and Camillo di Borghese (afterwards Paul V.), in his Spanish itinerary of 1594. Another more cheerful dish, which Sanchica set before the smartly dressed page who came to announce her father's elevation to the governorship of the "insula," was called merced de Dios—God's grace—composed of fried bacon and eggs, with honey, as we are told expressly in the 'Pícara Justina,' published in 1605 (p. 271 of the Mad. ed. 1735). A third epithet was and is applied to a "picked-up dinner," which they regard as "doing penance" to partake of; so they say, "Come and take pot-luck with us to-day"—Venga V. á hacer penitencia con nosotros hoy.

Now, the first or Manchegan apodo has never been clearly understood in Spain or elsewhere to this day. The conjectures about it may be divided into three distinct epochs.

The first epoch (1612–1732) characterized it as "bacon and eggs," confounding it with Justina's merced de Dios. Our earliest translator, Shelton, declares in 1612 that the Knight ate "collops and eggs" on Saturdays. This happy hit crossed the Channel, and in 1614 Cesar Oudin decided it was collops and eggs (des œufs et du lard); Franciosini, at Rome, put the same in his dictionary in 1620 (carne secca con uova); and Oudin, again, in his excellent 'Tesoro' of 1621, robbed bodily by Victor, 1609 (O.'s 1st ed. was 1607), said that he had partaken of it at Valencia in 1610. But since it was a dish of Castile and La Mancha alone, as Borghese tells us, one suspects a little broma on the part of Cæsar in Spain. Then Motteux, in 1700, guesses it was "scraps and penance"—not a bad guess; while Sobrino, five years later, with a French grimace, opines for soupe aux pois. The next year, 1706, our London Capt. Stevens reverts to "collops and eggs," adding naïvely, "because it is reckon'd a sorry dish for poor people, or only for a need."

This achieved, the era of Academical dictionaries dawned on the world, and the second period in the history of our christening was inaugurated by their folio of 1732, whereby it must for ever after be conceded that "sorrows and wailings" was only a Manchegan euphemism for an "Omelet of Eggs and Brains." Some of the latter were needed to account for the exile of the collops of bacon, but as academicians were then all "Old Christians," without vestige of Jew or Moor in their blood, the omission was, on the whole, acceptable. This decision went on in subsequent editions, 1780, '83, '91, 1803, finding great favor with all but "Marranos," who ought to have asked them for albricias—and was obeyed in England by Pineda (1740) and Del Pino (1763), albeit Baretti (1778) would not go beyond "sorrows and troubles."

As the initiator of a third epoch (1797-1884), up rises Pellicer in 1797, one of the orthodox sages of Calle de Leon (Acad. of Hist.), and brings out of the fashionable presses of Gabriel de Sancha a superb edition of the 'Quixote' in five large volumes, of which one of our copies is on large thick paper. What does this new phenomenon do but tell his neighbors of the Calle Valverde that they are all wrong, and have been for sixty-five years, that it was no omelet at all that Don Alonso Quixano ate on Saturdays, but an olla, a ragout, a stew, with a long story about the farmers of La Mancha losing their sheep mysteriously, like Pathelin's draper, the remnants of which were sold cheap and served up as a pot-au-feu on meagre day, causing the groans and "breakings" aforesaid. This was deemed satisfactory to the academics, although the connection between an omelet and a stew was not clear, but after a long session, lasting from 1797 through the Peninsular war till 1817, the whole note of Don Antonio was adopted and inserted bodily into the new Dictionary without a hint as to its source or the reasons for their own stultification. Now, where, in the name of all that is honest, did Don Juan Antonio Pellicer y Saforcada trump up his new legend? When we once asked the question of a group of Madrid literati, who, seated on barrels and boxes in the trastienda of Murillo's bookstore in the Calle Alcalá, No. 18, used to discourse of history and letters, the only answer vouchsafed us by Sancho-Rayon, he of the 'Documentos Inéditos,' was, ¡ Qué c——jo in qué ocho cuartos! which, being mildly interpreted, is: Que diable!

Inquisicion (La).—Véase Hermandad (La Santa), What did the "Fraternity" founded in 1476 over all Spain and reorganized in 1486 have to do with the "Inquisition" founded at Seville in 1480, but not put in operation till 1483? And by whom was it called Santa? By the people, doubtless, for the official laws regulating it and published at Alcalá in 1503 and 1528 never call it otherwise than "La Hermandad" (the Fraternity), and never once mention the Inquisition. It is true that in time the Brotherhood, which was only intended to be a rural mounted police at the orders of the Alcaldes, to suppress brigandage, and which still exists as the excellent Guardia Civil Corps, did obey the commands of the Inquisition, through the fanaticism of the Alcaldes; but what man or body, civil or religious, in Spain, from the King to the herdsman, did not do the same in the sixteenth and following centuries?

But there was in Cervantes an occasion for a note on the Inquisition, of which Clemencín was profoundly ignorant, for he vouchsafes us no reference thereto, nor does he even restore the text mangled by the Holy Office. In the Second Part of D. Q., which came out in 1615, Cervantes had written (chap. 36, f. 140 b of the original ed.), "Y aduierta Sancho, que las obras de caridad que se hazen tibia y floxamente, no tienen merito, ni valen nada" (And take heed, Sancho, that acts of charity performed in a lukewarm and indifferent spirit possess no merit and are valueless). And so in the year 1632 (seventeen years later!), when the Inquisitor-General, Antonio Zapata, published at Seville his monster folio 'Index Expurgatorius,' there appeared on p. 980 of the Appendix (showing that it was one of the last things discovered) the following insertion: "MIGVEL Cervantes Saavedra. Segunda parte de Don Quixote cap. 36. al medio, borrese, las obras de caridad" (etc., as above—"M. C. S. Second part of D. Q. chap. 36, half way down, expunge, acts of charity," etc.). It is evident that future editors would have to plaster the text considerably to produce a fair cicatrix of the mangled edges; but no, their history had taught them many expedients, and therefore we find in all subsequent Spanish editions the passage is perfectly repaired by simply going further than the pious Dominicans, and, leaving out "y aduierta Sancho, que," closing what precedes by a full stop. Thus the naughty reflection, applicable then as now to nine-tenths of the Peninsular alms-givers, was so healed that posterity, and, of course, Clemencín (V. 240*), never noticed the omission. We first learned of it by reading the 'Index' itself. Somebody (Aribau) says it is in that of 1619, but there was no Spanish Index of that year, and the one Turrettin reprinted at Geneva was that of Madrid, 1612, issued three years before the Second Part of the 'Quixote' came out. We can assure the interested that we are exact, since our collection possesses every original Index Expurgatorius ever published, from 1544, and the Spanish ones from 1551, to 1844-8—the which are accessible to any one in New Haven, and in no other one place in all Christendom, not even in Bonn.

There should have been, then, in Bradford's 'Index,' an article under Inquisicion and also Indice Expurgatorio, to complete Clemencín, the latter of which might also have included the general expurgation of Cervantes's works found only in the Lisbon Index of 1624, fol. (pp. 905-907—four full columns). But, "Inquisición, chitón!"

THE PEACE OF EUROPE.

PARIS, March 23, 1887.

A WAR panic has agitated all Europe during the last few weeks. It seems as if the gates of the temple of Janus were already opened. Now that the danger—at least the imminent danger—seems over, it is not inappropriate to draw the moral of the late events and to look for the causes of such a great emotion. The origin of the panic was the speech pronounced by the Chancellor of northern Germany on the question of the military Septennate. Prince Bismarck drew a picture of Europe which was far from reassuring. He represented France as preparing for revenge, though her successive administrations were ready enough to give pacific assurances to Germany. He intimated that though the majority of the French nation was not inclined to war, this majority would sooner or later be led by a minority of agitators. The history of France showed that such minorities had always decided her fate; the provinces were governed by Paris, and Paris fell from time to time into the hands of a revolutionary mob. It also often happened that a Government, feeling itself weak and on the point of being overturned, tried to avoid its fate by throwing the country in some adventure. In fact, Prince Bismarck seemed to consider a war with France as inevitable. He could not name the day, the year, or the occasion, but France was not reconciled to the Treaty of Frankfort; not a single statesman had dared to accept the loss of Alsace as one of those facts which separate the present from the past by an eternal boundary; the French people continued to entertain hopes and ambitions which could only be satisfied with war. And what would not a new war be between two nations both strong, both brave, animated with irreconcilable aspirations? Prince Bismarck said, with his usual frankness, the war of 1870 was mere child's play compared to the future war. He recalled the invasions of

*To restore, put a comma after prêcio, seventh line, and insert as above: y aduierta Sancho, etc.

Germany under the First Napoleon, he showed the necessity for the conqueror to inflict wounds which could not be healed in a lifetime. He urged in consequence the necessity for the German people to increase the military force of Germany, and he dissolved the Parliament which would not give him the military Septennate.

The German people answered his call, and the military Septennate is voted. I remember the time when it was said in France, before the vote of the last plébiscite, "L'Empire, c'est la paix." Now we hear it said every day and by everybody, "The Septennate is peace." When you try to analyze this sentence, which passes for an axiom, you feel somewhat embarrassed. It is difficult to understand in reality that peace is more assured because the German army will be increased by 40,000 men, and because Prince Bismarck disposes of a more complacent majority. As the alarm was probably too great six weeks ago, the present confidence is probably too great. There are some general features in the situation of Europe which are far from reassuring. First of all we must notice that the best arguments which are found for the preservation of peace are preparations for war: the famous maxim, "Si vis pacem, para bellum," has never been obeyed as it is now. Our peace is really an armed peace: millions of men are in arms in Europe, all ready at an hour's notice to destroy each other. France is thinking of celebrating in two years the centenary of the famous year 1789, "l'année des principes," as it is sometimes called. But what, a philosopher may say—what has been the result of the great movement which prepared the French Revolution, the abolition of all privileges, of all the abuses of the Middle Ages? Where have the great principles of "liberty, equality, fraternity" led mankind after a hundred years? What has been the result of parliamentary government, of constitutional guarantees, of the development of the press, of the constant increase of knowledge, of popular education? The future of all civilized countries lies hidden in a few solitary wills; the power of a few men for good or for evil is practically as great as ever could have been the power of Louis XIV. or of Napoleon. It is idle to say that these solitary wills can only accomplish great objects if they act in accordance with the great social and political necessities of the time; the same could have been said of Louis XIV. and of Napoleon. Napoleon III. succeeded in liberating Italy; he did not succeed when he attempted to prevent the formation of German unity. He had it, nevertheless, in his power to plunge France into a war the effects of which will be felt by generations to come.

In the last century and in our own, the relations of the nations of Europe were subject to treaties which were known in all their parts. The treaties of Vienna, made after the downfall of Napoleon, were, during the greater part of a century, the foundation of the European peace. All the sovereigns and all the nations were bound to protect their stipulations. We now hear constantly of an alliance between the two German empires, of a treaty between Northern Germany and Austria-Hungary. We know, by the declarations of the chancellors of these two Empires, that such a treaty was signed at the time of the journey of Prince Bismarck to Vienna; we know that the treaty has just been renewed for a certain term. We are sometimes told that this treaty has a purely defensive character; but who knows exactly the terms and the stipulations of this important document except the two Emperors and their two chancellors? In what eventualities must Austria-Hungary join her army to that of the Northern Empire? It is often said that the two empires guarantee to each other, against all aggressors, their existing frontiers. Is this quite certain? Has no difference been made between the provinces of Austria which belonged to the ancient confederation, and those which were merely the acquisitions of the Hapsburgs? Can Germany look with the same eye on Austria proper, on Bohemia, on Moravia, and on some other provinces, as Bosnia or Herzegovina? The new Emperor, accepting all the obligations of the imperial dignity, does not probably consider himself obliged to increase these obligations; there are in the Balkan peninsula provinces whose fate is abandoned to the future. It is therefore quite possible to admit the eventuality of a struggle between Austria-Hungary and Russia which would be confined to provinces that have never been under the imperial sway. The only eventuality foreseen may have been the case in which victory would bring the conqueror into some of the ancient provinces of Austria and too near the centre of Europe.

To the uncertainties which surround the mutual obligations of Austria-Hungary and of Northern Germany, add the uncertainties attached to the relations of these two empires and of Russia. Here we are entering a terra incognita. The relations of these courts do not always take the character of ordinary diplomatic documents; it may even be said that imperial letters have assumed the place of treaties and of conventions in the most important matters, since the Emperor of Russia has been, so to speak, his own chancellor. There has really been no successor to Prince Gortchakoff; M. de Giers cannot be said to hold the position so long occupied by the Prince, and in other times by Nesselrode. The present Emperor has taken the device of Louis XIV., "Le roi gouverne par lui-même." He assumed power under the most difficult circumstances. His absolute authority is constantly undermined by the Nihilist propagandism, and influenced by the passions of the Panslavist party. He commands and obeys at the same time. He was led into the Eastern war by the Panslavist party, and discovered that corruption had entered the War Office as it had every branch of the administration. Himself honest, pure-minded, animated by the best sentiments, he finds himself separated from a devoted people by a host of incompetent officials. He can always appeal to the devotion of the people, but the Russian people is still an inorganic and unconscious force; and the last war against Turkey showed that, in many senses, Russia is still "un colosse aux pieds d'argile." Since Plevna great efforts have been made for the improvement of the army, and Russia has become more formidable in a military point of view. Nobody could prophesy what would be the result of a struggle between Russia and Austria. It seemed at one moment as if this struggle were very near. After the deposition of Prince Alexander there was in Hungary, in Austria, even in Northern Germany, a sort of tollé against Russia. England headed the movement, making an appeal to all the Powers. Austria, Italy answered her call, and we saw for a moment the signs of a coalition against Russia.

Russia, if we are well informed, before entering into a new war, made a solemn appeal to Berlin; direct communications took place between the Emperor Alexander and his uncle. We have seen the result. Prince Bismarck threw cold water on the friends of Battenberg, of "unser lieber Held," and Battenberg sank out of sight. The Bulgarian question remains, however, and the Bulgarians cannot all be sent to Darmstadt. Prince Bismarck had good reasons for abandoning the young German prince who had for a moment all the sympathies of Germany; his great, his constant preoccupation, is the preservation of peace between Austria and Russia. He knows that such a war would perforce become a war between Germany and Russia—a calamitous, long, endless war, into which France would be drawn by an inexorable fatality. Even with the help of Austria-Hungary, even with the help of Italy, it would not be a very easy task for the new German Empire to protect its long frontiers at the same time on the east and on the west. The gains in a successful war would be little, compared with the possible losses in case of a defeat. It is obviously the duty of the German Chancellor to preserve the equilibrium in the East; to prevent Russia and Austria from giving offence to each other; to submit, as much as possible, all Eastern questions to European arbitration. This is not easy: it is the labor of Sisyphus. Prince Bismarck is constantly met by the passions of the Panslavist party; by the passions of the Hungarians, of the Slavs; by the Russian press; by the anti-German influences which are always at work in the great Empire of the North. The equilibrium which he maintains by his efforts is but an unstable equilibrium; a Nihilist plot, a caprice, an accident, an interference of England, may destroy in a minute the work of months and of years. Russia at times appears to us like a chaos, without anybody to say "Fiat lux." We have a dim suspicion that there are in this extraordinary country unexhausted treasures of devotion, of fanaticism, of hidden strength. We sometimes admire the courage of the men who defended Sebastopol and who took Plevna; and sometimes we suspect that Europe is threatened with a new invasion of the barbarians, and that Oriental ignorance may swamp Occidental culture. There is something almost alarming even in the Russian literature, which has recently become more accessible to us. The spirit of Gogol, of Turgeneff, of Tolstoi, of Dostoyevsky, is a spirit different from ours; we admire them all the more that we do not quite understand them.

If Occidental Europe were firmly united, if all its members were working harmoniously, there would not be much danger to our own civilization and culture; but the seeds of discord which were sown by the Second Empire have borne their fruit. There is no longer any solidarity in Europe. "L'Europe, quelle est cette femme?" asked Forcade many years ago. The question can now be asked with more reason. The law of nations has become uncertain; there are no fixed, no permanent, no well-defined alliances. The nations are in arms; people still cry peace, but there is no peace. After 1815 the sovereigns formed what they called the Holy Alliance; they all united in defence of monarchical and conservative principles. In our day we have seen Arnim fall into disgrace because he favored the monarchical cause in France; the French Communists are ready to join hands with the most absolute sovereign in Europe; and all nations look upon war and force as the "ultima ratio."

ANGLO-SAXON PIRATING.

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Arthur Gilman would be quite right in saying that Englishmen ought to be ashamed of making disparaging remarks about American "pirating," were it not for one very essential consideration. Englishmen are not collectively responsible for the pirating, while Americans are. We have, through our representatives in Congress, deliberately and repeatedly refused to adopt a law which would protect the rights of English and American authors; of course, England would at any time have welcomed and reciprocated such action.

There is no country in the world where the people are so virtuous that no one can be found to avail himself of an opportunity for profit which is sanctioned by law, for fear of infringing on what are in equity the rights of some other person. It is idle, therefore, to express either censure or surprise at the fact that there are publishers in England or America who print books which the law makes public property; what rightly excites indignation is that a great people should deliberately uphold such injustice.

TRANSFORMATION OF SURNAMES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A case of transformation of surnames once fell under my notice which interested me. A M. Dupont came, some thirty years ago, from France to Canada, and there brought up a family of children. Two of the sons, when grown, came to "the States," and one of them promptly changed his name to Dubridge, alleging that nobody could speak his name. The other brother, in a distant city, retained the old form.

MICHIGAN, March 28, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Speaking of changes in name reminds me of a Lithuanian Jew by the name of Hitchcox! But how did he obtain this un-Jewish name? Very simply. In Europe he was called Yitschak (=Isaac). Owing to the inability of the Lithuanians to pronounce y before e or i, and their confusion of sibilants (ts into ch, so they will say, "Cats the catch in the kitsen"), it meets us in the form Itch-chak. Our Yankees, of course, change the rough ch into the smooth k, making it Itchcok, and from this to Hitchcox is but one step.

W. WILLNER.

YALE COLLEGE, April 1, 1887.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Like your correspondent in last week's Nation, I was reminded, by the previous article on the transformation of names, of the case quoted by Mr. Ed. Livingston in his 'Answer to Mr. Jefferson,' on the famous subject of "The New Orleans Batture," and perhaps some of your readers may be amused by the correct version of Mr. Livingston's statement, as given on page 80 of the 'Answer,' printed in Philadelphia by William Fry, 1813.

In speaking of the "ingenious process" by which Mr. Jefferson derives the word apposition from the Latin incrementum latens, through translation by Theophilus into Greek, and retranslation into Latin, Mr. Livingston quotes the following instance in which this process was successfully applied to effect a change of name:

"An unfortunate Scotchman, whose name was Feyerston, was obliged, in pursuit of fortune, to settle among some Germans in the western part of New York. They made a much better proschósis than Theophilus did; they translated him literally into German and called him Feurstein. On his return to an English neighborhood, his new acquaintances discovered that Feurstein in German meant Flint in English. They retranslated instead of restoring his name, and the descendants of Feyerston go by the name of Flint to this day. I ought, however, to except one of his grandsons, who settled at the Acadian coast, on the Mississippi, whose name underwent the fate of the rest of the family. He was called, by a literal translation into French, 'Pierre à fusil'; and his eldest son, returning to the family clan, underwent another proskusis, and was called Peter Gun."

Messrs. Nicolay and Hay, in addition to the Life of Lincoln now appearing in the Century, will publish through the Century Company the complete works of the President. "These will fill some three to five octavo volumes, including his speeches, addresses, state papers, his public letters, his private correspondence (a great part of which is up to this time unpublished), his official opinions and memoranda upon some of the most important events of the war, and some very curious and interesting miscellaneous pieces. In connection with his correspondence will be printed many hitherto unpublished letters from prominent persons, which are necessary to a full understanding of Mr. Lincoln's own letters. The works will be accompanied with elaborate notes, historical and explanatory."

We understand that a work on 'Roman Excavations since 1870,' by Prof. R. Lanciani, may be expected in the fall, Houghton, Mifflin & Co. being the publishers.

Thomas Whittaker & Co., London, have in press a translation of Chaplain Koch's 'Prince Alexander of Battenberg: his Life and Reign in Bulgaria'; 'The Jubilee of George III., Oct. 25, 1809,' compiled from authentic sources by Thomas Preston; and 'Technical School and College Buildings,' by E. C. Robins—a quarto of 250 pages, with 114 illustrations.

Almost every phase of Franklin's varied genius and public usefulness is manifest in the second volume of his collected works as edited by Mr. John Bigelow (Putnams). Here is the famous supposititious "Speech of Polly Baker," assiduous multiplier of her kind out of wedlock—a pure piece of "copy-making" by a journalistic wag and social satirist. The philosopher appears in the numerous letters relating to electricity, one of which discusses its value as applied to paralysis; in the letter to Jared Eliot, February 13, 1750, which records Franklin's discovery (in 1743) that our northeast Atlantic coast storms begin to leeward—i. e., at the South; or in the letter to Peter Collinson, telling how Franklin rode beside an infant whirlwind endeavoring to cut it with his whip till it outstripped him. For the same correspondent he draws a discouraging picture of the quality of the German immigrants to Pennsylvania in the middle of the last century, apprehending that with all their virtues they may swamp the American commonwealth. The statesman stands out in the Plan of Union for the Colonies in 1754, and the ancillary plan for settling two English colonies between the Ohio and Lake Erie, as a barrier to French and Indian invasion. Mr. Bigelow has profited by our suggestion to make his table of contents briefly analytical. In another volume we hope he will have the courage to go further, and vary the running-title of the odd folios according to the topic.

The second division of Mr. A. Featherman's "Social History of the Races of Mankind" treats of 'Papuo- and Malayo-Melanesians' (London: Trübner & Co.). His first volume, which was devoted to the Aramæans, has already been noticed in the Nation, and certain errors of statement therein pointed out. These errors were connected with the ancient history; in the present volume the author deals entirely with modern material, drawing his information from the works of travellers and governmental reports. He has collected a vast number of details about the Pacific Islanders which may serve as material for social and religious history. It is a merit of the work that it does not attempt to make theories, but sets down the simple facts in orderly arrangement and without comment. At the end of each section, the author gives a list of authorities, but in the body of the book does not refer to the sources whence he draws his particular statements; perhaps the large number of minute details would make a citation of sources impossible. It is only in the preface that the author speaks of his theory of social growth, and says sharp things of Darwinism, Christianity, and the English Parliament; but this does not diminish the value of the body of the book, supposing his details to be all correct.

The New York Shakespeare Society has published the second and concluding part of its 'Digesta Shakespeareana' compiled under the direction of Mr. Appleton Morgan. It is called a "topical index" of English Shaksperiana exclusive of literary criticism. The selection and arrangement are both somewhat curious. "Other Poets," for instance, is an absurd title, but why place Ford under it and not Webster, and why is the short list practically monopolized by "The Mermaid Séries"? It is noticeable that the references to the editor's own works are 41, being exceeded in number only by those to Halliwell-Phillips's; while Furnivall gets 7, Dyce 9, R. G. White 20, Whipple 1, Dowden 1, Wright 1, Symonds 18, etc. Such a scholar as Daniel is not mentioned at all. These figures speak for themselves. The work is to be supplemented by an index of foreign titles set to these same unskilful headings.

Iron and coal form the chief topics of vol. xv of the Tenth Census, 'Mining Industries of the United States,' prepared under the direction of Prof. Raphael Pumpelly, the precious metals being expressly excluded. The illustrations, maps, sections, tables, and graphic statistics are most abundant, and the amount of detail in the text enormous. At the end we have a Directory of Bituminous Coal Mines, and one of Iron Ore Mines, and an Index to Mining Industries, by States and otherwise. An infrequent if not novel device is the dividing of each page of text into six equal bands or strata, indicated by a b c d e f in black letters in the margin, for the sake of facilitating references from the index.

Nos. 37 and 38 in the series of little volumes known as "Questions of the Day" (G. P. Putnam's Sons) consist of 'American State Constitutions, a Study of their Growth,' by Henry Hitchcock; and 'The Inter-State Commerce Act, an Analysis of its Provisions,' by John R. Dos Passos. The first of these is an address delivered before the New York State Bar Association in January last, in which the author pointed out, in an instructive manner, a variety of interesting facts in the development of our constitutional systems. One of the best parts of the address is the account of the changes that have gone on as to the appointment of the judges: "In 1800 there were fifteen States in this Union. . . . In no one of those States were judges then elected by the people. . . . In 1886 . . . in twenty-three States all judicial officers are elected by popular vote." The writer gives his own opinion in favor of the method which exists under the national Constitution and in eight of the States, that of appointment by the Executive and confirmation by the Senate or a Council. The little volume of Mr. Dos Passos presents the text of the Inter-State Commerce Act, and some analysis and illustration of its provisions. It is a timely and convenient book.

In 'The Game of Draw-Poker' (White, Stokes & Allen) Mr. John W. Keller sets forth much sound doctrine on a subject as to which much heresy is rife. The noble game of draw-poker, the chief gift of the Argonauts of '49 to mankind, has of late become overlaid with monstrous variations—"skips," "blazes," the introduction of the "joker," and a profusion of "bucks" and "jack-pots." Mr. Keller has seized the fundamental idea of this truly American game, that its essential principle is freedom of choice—in other words, an option to play or not to play is allowed at every stage of the game. We could wish that he had elaborated this principle a little more fully and dwelt on it a little more firmly. When it is once rightly apprehended, the pernicious "jack-pot" is doomed. In the main Mr. Keller's explanation of the game and advice for its playing are excellent. Like most other recent writers about poker, he feels it necessary to reprint Gen. Schenck's celebrated summary of the game. We are surprised that so conservative a man as Mr. Keller shows himself to be in this little book, should give up any of his few pages to so pestilent an innovation as "Progressive Poker."

A pretty pamphlet on 'The Homing of Dogs,' or the faculty of returning to their old haunts from a great distance without the aid of observation or memory, has been issued by W. R. Lord of Wollaston, Mass., who asks for instances additional to those he has collected.

The new catalogue of Princeton College past and present has just been published, and makes an octavo of 240 pages. Six hundred names have been added since the last issue, and a great number of corrections and changes have been made. The surviving alumni exceed 3,200. Prof. Henry C. Cameron, the compiler (now as for the past twenty years) bespeaks coöperation in perfecting this record. From the material side, we venture to suggest that the typography is not abreast of the times. The cost of the catalogue is, indeed, borne by a private individual; but it is taste, not cost, which we have in mind.

The April number of the Swiss Cross makes a very attractive appearance. The contents are interesting in many ways, and there are two more articles on amateur photography. One of these shows how to imitate old paintings, and offers some effective examples reproduced by "process."

The last Bulletin of the Société de Géographie contains an interesting description by M. Janikowski, a Polish explorer, of the Island of Fernando Po and its inhabitants. The Spanish garrison, a few traders, and 145 Cuban patriots, victims of the last insurrection, constitute the white population. The negroes are divided into the "gentlemen de couleur" and the aborigines. The former, the town blacks, are very much inferior both in intelligence and morality to the latter. Poisoning, for instance, is so common among them that at least half of the deaths are due to this cause. The natives, known as Bubis, differ materially from every other African race both in appearance and customs. They number about 30,000 and have a regularly organized government, consisting of a king, a council of the chiefs of the villages, and a militia in which all the men capable of bearing arms are enrolled. There is also a police force which maintains order and punishes the crimes of murder, assaults on travellers, and theft. The Bubis have neither idols nor fetish, their religion being merely a belief in a good and a bad spirit. Lieut. Gouin, resident at Nam-Dinh, contributes some notes on the commercial resources of Tonkin, which he does not rate very highly, as well as an elaborate account of the mountainous zone lying between Annam and the valley of the Mekong, inhabited by a semi-independent race called Muongs. The maps accompanying this number are of the river Ogowe on the west coast of Africa.

The Scottish Geographical Magazine for February opens with a paper, by Dr. John Murray, on the total land rainfall and its relations to the annual discharge of rivers. The amount of rainfall is estimated at 29,350 cubic miles; South America receiving by far the largest proportion, a quarter, with only an eighth of the total surface. The tables, as well as the maps given, are chiefly based on data collected by Prof. Loomis of Yale College. "The Place Names of Iona," by Mr. A. Carmichael, is devoted to old Scottish lore respecting St. Columba. There is also the first of a series of papers on the ancient geography of Scotland.

The disproportion between Viollet-le-Duc's powers as a designer in comparison with his authority as an historical expert and as a teacher in architecture is well known. Quite otherwise is it with his capacity as an illustrator of books, so that an article on "Viollet-le-Duc Vignettiste," by Jules Adeline, in the March issue of Le Livre, offers a genuine novelty. The revelation pertains to a book fifty years old, the 'Voyages pittoresques dans l'ancienne France' of Taylor, Nodier, and De Cailleux, in which the part of the future author of the 'Discourses on Architecture' and the great Dictionary was to furnish vignettes, borders, etc., many of which are reproduced in facsimile by Le Livre. More, however, are described without this aid by M. Adeline, and his paper thus becomes as wearisome to read as any of Mr. John Ashton's descriptions of English caricatures under the like circumstances. The designs actually shown have a Gallic freedom and some cleverness, but do not justify the extravagant estimate put upon them by their exhibitor. A curious chapter in the history of the library of the city of Paris is related by M. Gustave Fustier; and few will dissent from his conclusion that the Institut is morally bound to restore to the city the "collection Moriau," i. e., the books and manuscripts bequeathed to the city by Antoine Moriau in 1759, and unjustifiably alienated and transferred to the Institut by the Abbé Hubert Pascal Ameilhon under the Directory. Ameilhon was custodian of the city library and member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-lettres. He was, shortly after the transfer, appointed librarian of the Arsenal.

The French painter, François Bonvin, who will be seventy years old next September, lost his sight last year and became dependent. His fellow-artists formed themselves into a "committee of patronage," with Meissonier and Bouguereau at the head, and called on one another to contribute a picture each for Bonvin's benefit. The sale of this generous contribution to his support during his declining years will take place on April 22. L'Art for March 1 (Macmillan) gives a full-page print of an original and apparently unfinished etching by Bonvin, "The Guitar Player."

The French reading public is destined to be amply provided with cheap books, good cheap books too. Besides the very excellent 'Bibliothèque Nationale' at twenty-five centimes a volume, and the 'Nouvelle Bibliothèque Populaire' at ten centimes, a new series has been started at the same fabulously low price. The 'Nouvelle Bibliothèque Populaire,' lately noticed in the Nation, is a Roman Catholic publication, and is continuing with much taste its issue of the purest masterpieces in the French language. The new venture is equally low in price. It is under the direction of M. Jules Lermina, whose well-known tendencies will make it all that its name promises. It is called "Bibliothèque Patriotique et Républicaine Illustrée," and is to appear weekly. The first ten volumes already present works of Victor Hugo, Molière, Gambetta, Diderot, J.-J. Rousseau, and of MM. Floquet and Claretie, not to forget the timely Gen. Boulanger, whose 'Vie et Discours,' as well as any of the other numbers, may be had for two cents.

The Harvard Summer School of Botany will open at the Botanic Garden, Cambridge, Mass., on July 6, and close on August 6. Saturdays will be excursion days for the study of the neighboring local flora. Particulars may be had by addressing Mr. James E. Humphrey, 6 Divinity Hall, Cambridge.

— Thomas Clarkson concludes the tenth volume of Leslie Stephen's 'Dictionary of National Biography' (Macmillan), and, in spite of all the great names which go before, his could not be thought an anti-climax, even were the arrangement not alphabetical. Two pages and a half, however, suffice to contain "the short and simple annals" of his far-working philanthropy; and this (not unfair) allotment, when compared with the space bestowed on men of genius like Chatterton, or of action like Marlborough, marks the common valuation of the reformer. Along with Chatterton, whose life is very skilfully sketched by Charles Kent, this volume contains Chapman, Chaucer (Prof. J. W. Hales), Churchill and John Clare (Leslie Stephen). Colley Cibber's career is told by Joseph Knight. The editor, besides the two articles just mentioned, shows his powers of condensed historical narration in the long account of Marlborough. He holds the scales very impartially, letting the facts speak for themselves, and his general view of the great commander is brief and almost incidental. Of Macaulay's ascription to Marlborough of a desire to get rid of Talmash, his only military rival, Mr. Stephen quietly remarks that "such insight into secret motives is only granted to men of Macaulay's omniscience." Less than twenty pages give scope enough to Samuel R. Gardiner for the portrayal of Charles I.; nearly twenty-five are occupied by Prof. A. W. Ward in dealing with Charles II. With the Princess Charlotte the Hanoverians are brought on the scene. Among the lesser lights are William and Robert Chambers; the sculptor Chantrey; Thomas Chippendale, of whom little is known beyond his furniture; Henry Langdon Childe, the inventor of the magic lantern's "dissolving views"; William B. Clarke, the first discoverer of gold in south Australia; and the Christies, of the famous line of auctioneers. The American interest of this volume is slighter than in any of the foregoing that we recall. We have remarked Charles Chauncy, the second President of Harvard College at "New Cambridge," as our New England university town is rather oddly denominated here; and Joseph Lemuel Chester, of whom it is truthfully said that "when he died he had no superior as a genealogist among English-speaking people." Mention is made of the fact that Col. Chester's manuscripts of the Oxford matriculations and of the "marriage allegations in the Bishop of London's Register" are now being printed.

—The last issue in Karl Vollmöller's "Englische Sprach- und Literaturdenkmale" is devoted to Lyly and Sidney. It contains the first part of 'Euphues,' with some omissions, and the first chapter of the 'Arcadia,' with notes upon the unusual words, in a very convenient form for students. The principal interest lies in the preface by the editor, Dr. Friedrich Landmann, which is really a brief monograph on Euphuism. According to the view taken, Lyly was not the inventor of this fashion, but merely the author of its literary monument. Euphuism is distinguished from that general and pervading taste for affectation, hyperbole, and all the eccentricities growing out of the Renaissance, and its defining characteristics are said to be (1) opposed and balanced grammatical structure, called parisonic antithesis; (2) transverse alliteration (e. g., f, l, g, m, followed by f, l, g, m), and similar tricks to point the parallelisms of the grammar; (3) the use of long strings of examples or similes to illustrate the main statement. This style was invented by Guevara, and introduced into England by his six translators, of whom Lord Berners, about 1534, and North, in 1557, were the most eminent. Lyly was merely the best writer in this foreign-mannered style. 'Euphues' itself is a compilation imitated from North's translations from Guevara, in matter as well as style, with some direct obligations to the classics. The rhetorical fashion, independently of the matter, was adopted by many writers, of whom Greene and Lodge were the last. 'Euphues' marks its climax, however, and was first effectually discredited by Sidney, whom Drayton praises for the reform. The 'Arcadia,' as is well known, is nevertheless from a Spanish model, Montemayor. This analysis withdraws Sidney from among the Euphuists, and specializes the sect to the advantage of literary history. The bearing of all this on Shakspere's early style and its sources is hinted at, but not developed; but the distinction between Euphuism and Arcadianism is well made, and clears up some puzzling questions and confusions in the sixteenth-century English style very effectively. The monograph in which the above is exhibited in detail, deserves the careful attention of students of that period.

— M. Taine's 'Napoléon Bonaparte,' the new chapters of his great philosophical history, "Les Origines de la France contemporaine," which appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes for February 15 and March 1, is making much stir in Paris. It is the subject of conversation and discussion, sharing public attention with the other chief literary sensation of the day, the 'Journal intime' of Benjamin Constant. The light artillery of the newspaper press is already brought to bear upon it, and it will not be long before the heavy guns of the serious critics open fire in their usual manner upon both the author and his work. In the meantime anecdotes which have a certain symbolical truth about them, even if the naked naturalistic fact is not there, are flying from every direction. The Figaro relates that M. Taine, who had long been one of the many literary friends of the Princess Mathilde, in speaking to her about his new work before it was finished, gave her to understand that his conclusions concerning Napoleon would be very severe; and the Princess replied that while she could not judge as severely as he would probably do, the man without whom she herself might have been an orange vender in the port of Ajaccio, still she had confidence in the tact of the great writer, whom she was happy to count among her friends. When the first article appeared, the astonishment of the Princess was great; after the second her displeasure expressed itself by a card left at the offender's door, bearing the crushing letters P. P. C. When Taine lamented this loss of an old friendship to Renan, says another story, Renan replied that, in order to be able to express his own opinions freely, he had formerly been obliged to offend a much greater lady than the Princess, and when he was asked who this was, he answered, "The Church." The moral of all this is, that the author of 'Napoléon Bonaparte,' after shocking all the religious and royalist beliefs of his countrymen by his literary and philosophical doctrines and his 'Ancien Régime,' and then rousing the passionate reprobation of the Republicans, who had felt that he belonged to them, by his later 'Révolution,' has now alienated the sympathies of his Bonapartist friends. It would be hard for a superficial observer not to look with a kind of compassion upon a man thus cut off from all political friendships, and who has nothing before him but the darkness and terrors of the radical and anarchical tempests he anticipates. But the author of "Les Origines de la France contemporaine," who has not yet said his last word upon the Empire, any more than upon the Revolution or the Ancien Régime, is not a man to throw away compassion upon, any more than hasty criticism, and these new chapters of his great work have within themselves compensations for even deeper wounds than they can have inflicted upon their author. Never has M. Taine shown his great qualities as a writer more brilliantly than in his 'Napoléon Bonaparte'; never has he shown greater courage and sincerity.

—Students of history will ever regard with veneration the names of the Benedictines of St. Maur, on whose labors are based all accurate knowledge of the history of France. Luc d'Achéry, Mabillon, Martène, Durand, Bouquet, Brial, Clément, Clémenceau, the authors of the 'Histoire Littéraire de France,' and many others of that goodly company, labored indefatigably through long generations to render available for research the only authentic sources of information of the past. Among other gigantic schemes of the brethren was a series of detailed histories of the great provinces of France. The plan was but partially carried out, but it resulted in Dom Lobineau's History of Britanny, Dom Plancher's History of Burgundy, Dom Félibien's History of Paris, and the History of Languedoc by Dom Devic and Dom Vaissette. This last, since its issue in 1742, has remained the leading authority on the annals of a province whose vicissitudes have a special and permanent interest. In the intervening century and a half, however, an enormous mass of previously unknown material has been brought to light, and modern methods of historical investigation demand that this should be coördinated and rendered accessible to the student. Thus an enlarged edition of Dom Vaissette's work seemed indispensable; M. Édouard Privat, a bookseller of Toulouse, called to his aid the leading scholars of France, and the result is a worthy expression of the most advanced condition of French historical science.

—The five folios of the original have been expanded into fourteen corpulent quartos, of which twelve have already been published; the remaining two, numbered 11 and 12, edited by M. Joseph Roman, and devoted to the wars of religion from 1547 to 1643, being shortly expected. Besides M. Roman, the principal collaborators are M. Édouard Barry, who treats the Gallo-Roman period and the ethnography; M. A. Molinier, who carries on the history up to 1443; and M. Ernest Rcshach, who continues it from 1643, where the original work ceases, up to 1790. Of these, we have examined with care only the five volumes allotted to M. Molinier, and we can answer for the conscientious exactness with which every available source of information, whether in print or MS., has been exhausted to render the history complete. In addition to this general editorship, specialists have been engaged upon the adjuncts now regarded as indispensable to the right understanding of the past. Epigraphy, for instance, is treated by MM. Lebègue and Germer-Durand, numismatics by MM. Charles Robert and Chalande, and language and literature by M. Chabaneau. It would be impossible to find elsewhere so convenient a summary of all that is known about the troubadours and the Jeux Floraux as that contained in the contributions of the latter gentleman; and we are tempted to quote, for the benefit of Browningites, from the material laboriously brought together from all sources concerning Sordello: "Sordels fo de Mantoana, d'un castel que a nom Got, gentil catanis, e fo avinens hom de la persona, e fo bons chantaire e bons trobaire e grans amaire. Mas mout fo truans e fals vas domnas e vas los barons ab cui el estava" (x. 313).

—In the forty-first annual report of the Director of the Harvard College Observatory, laid before the Board of Trustees early in the present year, Prof. Pickering states that the munificence of the late Robert Treat Paine has now begun to provide the encouragement which he desired to give to the science of astronomy; the sum of $165,000, comprising about half of his bequest, having been received by the Treasurer of the University, and the income therefrom being already available for the support of work at the Observatory. The addition of this fund to those previously available raises the endowment of the institution to a little short of $400,000. This recent increase in the means of the Observatory, Prof. Pickering states, will ultimately permit a corresponding extension in its work, but for the moment will largely be required for the publication of observations already made, and for effecting permanent improvements in the condition of the institution which have long been urgently needed. The remounting of the large telescope, and a new Observatory building, are in view, as well as a rather ambitious plan for the extension of astronomical investigation, which contemplates the support of researches conducted at other places by funds administered at Harvard. During the past year the Observatory has lost the services of Prof. Rogers, for a long series of years an indefatigable worker with the Meridian Circle. As a memorial to the late Prof. Henry Draper, the study of the photography of stellar spectra undertaken by him is now, through the liberality of Mrs. Draper, being prosecuted on a scale appropriate to the advance in this department of science, and forms an important extension of the work of the Observatory. The meridian photometer has been kept in active service throughout the year, and leaves little to be desired as a means of measuring the brightness of stars down to the ninth magnitude. The rapidity of the observations with this instrument is such that as many as 179 stars have been measured by a single observer in one evening. Various tests have been applied to detect the presence of systematic errors in this instrument, and extended comparisons of the results with similar work conducted elsewhere have been instituted. We have already adverted to the research in stellar photography conducted by Prof. Pickering, with the aid of the Bache fund, with such promising results. In order to facilitate a more careful study of the spectra of the brightest stars, Mrs. Draper has loaned to the Observatory the eleven-inch photographic telescope employed by her husband, and it has been mounted with two prisms in front of the object-glass, one of which has a clear aperture of eleven inches square and an angle of nearly fifteen degrees, forming thus the most powerful equipment for stellar spectroscopy in existence.

FYFFE'S MODERN EUROPE.

A History of Modern Europe. By C. A. Fyffe, M.A. Vol. II., 1814–1848. Henry Holt & Co.

To every generation one period is always unknown. This historical terra incognita is the age which precedes their own. Mr. Fyffe, therefore, is, for modern Englishmen and Americans, the guide to an undiscovered world. He tells them of men and events of which every man fancies, indeed, he knows a good deal, and of which most men in reality know nothing. Metternich, Kotzebue, Castlereagh, Canning, Capodistrias, the Congress of Verona, the fall of Tripolitza, the Regency of Espartero, the theories of Gioberti, the end of the Polish Constitution, the Battle of Navarino—what are they all to nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of Mr. Fyffe's readers but words which call up no definite ideas? For ten educated men who can give us an account of Marston Moor, of Bunker's Hill, of the taking of the Bastile, we shall scarcely find one who can give any accurate account of the Siege of Missolonghi, of the Battle of Navarino, or of the Wartburg Festival. Yet, though the men now living know so little of the events which excited their fathers, the nearness to us of the era with which Mr. Fyffe is occupied is no less remarkable than its distance from us. Europe on the eve of 1848 is a world in which many of us have lived. Pius the Ninth, Mazzini, Kossuth, are names which remind many of us of men whom we have seen and even known. There must be scores of persons on both sides of the Atlantic not much past middle life to whom the revolutions of 1848 recall vivid memories. As a reader peruses Mr. Fyffe's pages, he feels like a traveller passing over a country which is in one sense new to him, yet constantly excites recollections of youth. He needs a guide to tell him where he is, to make him recognize the grand outlines of the land.

Such a guide is Mr. Fyffe. He is not exactly an historian, he is not a philosopher who speculates about history. He is what we have called him, a guide. He unfolds before us a sort of map of the last age. His book is not a great work, but it may be a very useful work to students who know how to use it. The right way to get from the book its real utility is to read it not slowly and minutely but quickly, and as a whole, and to obtain from it the information which a general view of an important period can give. It cannot teach us details, but it can teach us what is a matter of far more importance, namely, the salient features in which an age that has just come to an end essentially differed from the times in which we live. No one who candidly asks this question from Mr. Fyffe will fail to get an answer. As to the exact nature of the response, those who consult our historical oracle will no doubt differ in accordance with their own different views of human progress. But one or two inferences flow so obviously from any clear narrative of the events which fill up the thirty-four years, 1814–1848, that their validity can hardly be disputed. These conclusions, however, though in one sense obvious, are, like other things which lie before men's eyes, frequently overlooked, while they possess an importance which justifies our pressing them upon the attention of our readers.

One influence of which we have now nearly forgotten the force, gave European politics from 1814 till very nearly 1840 a turn which modern students can hardly understand. Every leading statesman in every European Cabinet remembered the Napoleonic wars, and the one object of European statesmanship was to prevent a new outbreak of warfare. This object, it should be noted, was in itself a good one, and, moreover, was attained. From 1815 to 1848, Europe as a whole enjoyed peace, and it was not until 1870 that Europe witnessed a struggle which could compare with the Napoleonic contest. True it is that the means by which tranquillity was maintained were fatal to liberty, and in many, though not in all, countries hostile to peaceful progress. But it is uncandid to deny that the policy of reactionary statesmen had, during the early part of the century, some real justification, and it is dense stupidity not to perceive that the love of peace and dread of revolution was at bottom the motive which induced despotic governments to commit acts of oppression which statesmanship and morality equally refuse to defend. No doubt there is something strange, something which suggests insanity, in the change in the character of Alexander. But the facts of the time give a more or less reasonable explanation of his conduct. He shared at one period the love of liberty which had been kindled among the peoples of Europe by the resistance to Napoleon's tyranny. He thought at a later period that freedom was becoming another name for revolution. He renounced his aspirations and fell back into the attitude natural to a Czar. Nor is there the least reason to suppose that Metternich, and other statesmen of his school, were insincere in their dread of Liberalism. No great outburst of enthusiasm for liberty was possible till, as in 1848, men had forgotten the Reign of Terror and the tyranny of Napoleon. And even in 1848 the leaders of the Revolution showed, with the one exception of a few Italian statesmen, an incompetence which half justified the determination of crowned heads to keep Liberal politicians out of power.

A second trait of the age with which we are concerned was the position of England; it was quite unlike the situation which she now occupies. She was, after the fall of Napoleon, in many respects the greatest Power in Europe. She alone had escaped from the revolutionary fever; she alone had repelled with absolute success the attacks of Napoleon; she alone had shown how a people might be free and yet be great; she alone possessed a general who had never been defeated by Napoleon or his marshals. To this we must add that the great war which had ruined other countries had enriched Great Britain. England has in many ways made gigantic progress during the last seventy-three years; but the rest of the world has progressed also, and no calm observer can doubt that England stands, both in wealth and in moral prestige, far less ahead of European States than she stood on the day when Napoleon was sent to St. Helena. The position occupied by England, combined with the general wish of the governing classes throughout Europe to maintain peace, accounts for two characteristics of English policy which puzzle the men of 1887. The first of these characteristics is the constant interest of England in European affairs. This fussiness had, in the eyes of men like Cobden, as it has in the eyes of Mr. Cobden's biographer, a touch of absurdity. Yet, whether right or wrong, it must seem to any one who realizes the state of affairs during the first quarter of this century, perfectly natural. Neither individuals nor nations are able to change suddenly views or lines of conduct forced upon them by the experience of a lifetime. Wellington, Russell, Palmerston had all formed their characters in an age when the foreign alliances, foreign wars, foreign insurrections, the shifting phases of European politics, were matters of vital importance to the United Kingdom. It may be said that with the fall of Napoleon the importance of foreign politics to England ended. Whether this can be said with truth admits of doubt. What is certain is that the men of the great war could not, human nature being what it is, adopt in a moment views of national interest brought at last into existence by the duration of the long peace. Nor was it possible for the nobler class of English statesmen, such as Canning, to forget that Europe had common interests, or not to imagine that the great free State should be the protector of European freedom.

Hence a second characteristic or trait almost as marked as the fussiness of English foreign policy. England, under the guidance of Ministers like Canning or Palmerston, is always seen coming forward as the patroness of Continental Liberalism. She, time after time, attempts, but with very rare success, to check armed intervention by despotic Powers in the affairs of independent States, and to check it by means of moral force. This course of action had its occasional triumphs. It established the independence of Belgium; it preserved the independence of Switzerland. But it irritated without in general checking despotic rulers, and encouraged without really helping the efforts of discontented peoples. The faults of the policy inherited by Palmerston from Canning are palpable. But the belief in moral force is in some points of view more respectable than the belief in big battalions, and there was a touch of nobility in the notion that the freedom of Europe was an English interest. In any case, history teaches the lesson that the policy of England, up to 1848, was the natural outgrowth of the position occupied by the country at the close of the war with France.

A third feature of the years which intervened between the fall of Napoleon and the fall of Louis Philippe, is, that two ideas were then popularly blended together which we now know to have no essential connection with each other. The cause of popular government was, in the minds both of kings and of rebels, identified with the cause of national independence or unity. Republicans were patriots and patriots were Republicans. The most obvious source of a most singular intellectual delusion was that in several countries, and especially in Italy, the struggle for nationality was, as a matter of fact, connected with the struggle for popular rights. But the true source lay a good deal deeper than any influence depending upon the political condition of particular nations. The age of reason had been succeeded by the age of feeling. Such enthusiasm for abstract principles as had heralded in the French Revolution had been gradually superseded by faith in historical ideals. Italians were more deeply moved by appeals to the past glories of Italy than by eulogies of liberty. The demand for German unity touched the popular imagination more easily than did the claim for constitutional rights. Yet the faith in liberty, fraternity, and equality was not dead, and the simplest way to cherish the old and the new creed was to blend them together into one faith. To do so was rendered the more easy because kings and ministers, sharing the delusions of their opponents, resisted the spirit of nationality, with which they had often no cause to quarrel, because they thought it but another name for that spirit of liberty which really menaced the established order of things. Cavour's claim to rank as a great political thinker rests on his clear perception of the fact that patriotism had no natural connection with republicanism, and that a patriot king might become the founder both of the unity of Italy and of the greatness of the monarchy.

Here, however, we touch on topics proper to Mr. Fyffe's next volume. That it will abound in interest we do not doubt. Meanwhile, the volume before us is sufficient to occupy students who, knowing that men's acts are really governed by their circumstances and ideas, wish to trace out the facts and the beliefs which, for the space of more than a quarter of a century, determined the action of the statesmen and the peoples of Europe.

RECENT POETRY.

If it be true, as Sir Philip Sidney says, that "poets did only teach by a divine delightfulness," then the two foremost poets of the age are relaxing their hold upon the enchanter's wand. Few among us will deny that—Emerson and Longfellow and Victor Hugo being gone—these two exalted positions belong to Tennyson and Browning, or Browning and Tennyson, as the case may be. Each of these poets has just published a volume, and, whatever qualities are shown by each, that of divine delightfulness can hardly be included. Yet we have also the authority of Sidney for the assertion that "of all writers under the sun, the poet is the least liar," and perhaps either of these two would prefer the quality of speaking the truth to all others. The curious thing is that, though they are only three years apart in age—Tennyson having been born in 1809 and Browning in 1812—an interval of at least a generation seems to separate them in respect to tone and flavor. It is hard to think of Browning as old; hard to remember that Tennyson was ever young. They have been read in America for nearly the same length of time, yet Browning societies are just now springing up all around us, while who hears of a Tennyson Society? The very qualities by which they discourage us in their two new volumes are so diverse as to carry out this curious antagonism. The worst thing that can be said of 'Locksley Hall Sixty Years After, etc.' (Macmillan) is that it makes the sweetness and ardor of the earlier 'Locksley Hall' appear ridiculous. The worst thing to be said of Browning's 'Parleyings with Certain People of Importance in their Day' (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) is that it sometimes recalls the too laborious obscurities of 'Sordello.' The one reverts to his youth by way of warning, the other by way of imitation.

There is little more to be said of Lord Tennyson's volume, where there are not even details of beauty to relieve the atmosphere of repulsiveness; but that of Browning is crammed with wit and wisdom, accessible, however, only to those who are content to pick out their morsels of poetry, so to speak, with nut-picks from a craggy shell. For those who are satisfied with this, well and good—and there are fortunately many such; but even the comparison with 'Sordello' leaves out the fine and intelligible theme which ran through all the mazes of the earlier book—the contest between the ideal and practical in every gifted nature. Many a boy or girl carried that poem on solitary walks for the help it gave in solving this problem, although the contest between Guelf and Ghibelline rolled vaguely past their indifferent ears. Their loyalty was 'Sordello's' vindication. It is always difficult to tell what book of poems the young mind will choose to feed on, and the very difficulties in this volume may offer food to many. But there is not the unity of purpose which saved 'Sordello,' and which afterwards, in Browning's hands, led up to a work so solid and so noble as 'Luria.' Nor are there any of those delicious songs which give such a charm to 'Pippa Passes,' and showed a gift that might, had it not been thrown away, have made its possessor distinctively the lyric poet of the age. But there are blank-verse descriptions here and there in the 'Parleyings' which almost recall the Miltonic lines in 'Sordello'—passages drawn from nature, like this, for instance:

"Boundingly up through Night's wall dense and dark,
Embattled crags and clouds, out broke the Sun
Above the conscious earth, and one by one
Her heights and depths absorbed to the last spark
His fluid glory, from the far fine ridge
Of mount-ain granite which, transformed to gold,
Laughed first the thanks back, to the vale's dusk fold
On fold of vapor-swathing, like a bridge
Shattered beneath some giant's stamp. Night wist
Her work done, and betook herself in mist
To marsh and hollow, there to bide her time
Blindly in acquiescence. Everywhere
Did earth acknowledge Sun's embrace sublime, Thrilling her to the heart of things." (P. 31.)

It is a long step from Browning to Coventry Patmore, yet the time is not so long ago when his 'Angel in the House' was received by many duteous wives as a fit recognition of their Eve-like submission; a sort of Church of England marriage service in verse, with the "love and cherish" duly included, but the "obey" always distinctly visible in the background. It was in its kind even pleasing, but a very little of it went a great way, and its author here gives us much more than a little of it. Now that Anthony Trollope is dead, and the dean and the cathedral-close and the county ball have become inconceivably wearisome in prose, it is impossible to prolong their interest in verse; and yet these themes, with a few equally tame angelic hosts and heavenly choirs, are all the material of Mr. Patmore's 'Poetical Works' (London: George Bell & Son). He closes, however, with a prose essay on "English Metrical Law" which is of more value than most of his poetry, and which begins with this very sensible proposition: "As dancing is no more than an increase of that element of measure which already exists in walking, so verse is but an additional degree of that metre which is inherent in prose speaking." Even this paper, however, is not to be compared with Sidney Lanier's very original and suggestive essay on the same subject.

Miss Mitford says of one of her heroes in 'Our Village' that he translated Horace "as all gentlemen do." Is it a proof of the advance in classical scholarship that English gentlemen now translate Greek oftener than Latin? The 'Odyssey' for this year is rendered—or at least twelve books of it—by the Earl of Carnarvon (Macmillan), who shows at the very outset his limitations by saying in his preface, "A translation cannot be a poem." Is not Chapman's Homer a poem? or, if he objects that this is not in any strict sense a translation, what shall we say of Longfellow's multitudinous versions, each combining the qualities of closeness and music so admirably that some of them bid fair actually to replace the originals in the literary history of the world? Again, if a translation cannot be a poem, why attempt the poetic form? why not rather adopt the rhythmic prose which Prof. Palmer has applied with such success to the 'Odyssey'? It is hard to find a passage in which Palmer is not at once more accurate and more poetic than Lord Carnarvon. Let us take a single instance of the superiority of the prose version.

The vivid description of the couching of Odysseus among the dry leaves, at the end of the fifth book of the 'Odyssey,' is thus rendered by Palmer: "As a man hides a brand in a dark bed of ashes, at some outlying farm where neighbors are not near, hoarding a seed of fire to save his seeking elsewhere, even so did Odysseus hide himself in the leaves; and on his eyes Athene poured a sleep to quickly ease him from the fatigue of toil, letting his eyelids close." The version is almost verbatim, yet is musical upon the ear; but the passage is thus hammered out by Lord Carnarvon:

"Like as when on the verge of some far field,
Where stands no neighboring homestead, men heap up
Some smouldering ember with the ashes grey,
And guard from wind and keep the spark alive;
So heaped the Hero o'er him the dry leaves,
And kind Athenê poured upon him sleep—
Rest to his eyelids' surcease of his toils."

Can any one place these two side by side and not recognize that Homer is in the one and not in the other? The whole vigor of the comparison is lost in an instant when the English translator brings "men" in the plural to cover the brand with ashes, thus losing the lonely picture of Homer's single wanderer (τίς). On the other hand, where Homer has the word "neighbors" (γείτονες), Lord Carnarvon substitutes "a homestead," which is far less effective. Instead of simply mentioning Odysseus by name he grandiloquently calls him "the Hero." To describe the relief of the tired man, Lord Carnarvon must bring in the nearly obsolete word "surcease," and must, for purposes of rhythm, lay the accent on the first syllable, which Shakspere never does. Worst of all, he omits the whole of the most vigorous line in the whole passage:

"Σπέρμα πυρὸς σώζων, ἵνα μή ποθεν ἄλλοθεν αὖοι," tersely and completely translated by Palmer, "hoarding a seed of fire to save his seeking elsewhere"; and substitutes for it a vague line, of which there is nothing in the original. As a wholly innocent intellectual exercise we can commend this new version, but it adds nothing to literature.

"And guard from wind and keep the spark alive,"

'The Purpose of the Ages,' by Jeanie Morison (Macmillan), comes before the public with an introduction by Prof. A. H. Sayce, a dedication to Robert Browning, and an intimation in the preface that Prof. Blackie of Edinburgh was her guide and friend. When we consider that George Ebers and others have found a theme for learned fiction in ancient Egypt, there would seem no reason why one bearing the poetic name of Jeanie Morison should not detect the material for poetry in the buried cities of Babylonia; but we fancy that the earlier Scottish bard who sang the charms of Miss Morison's namesake would have shuddered a little over a volume of nearly 400 pages written to make ancient Assyria attractive in verse. The thought of the poem is the purpose of the ages. The learning is choice and extensive, so that the notes are the most attractive part of the book; but when we revert to Sidney's test of "divine delightfulness," the whole thing fails. It must be owned with sadness that it is an easy thing to lay the book down and hard to take it up again. The verdict is fatal.

It is curious to turn to the last of the many books of Miss Morison's ally and see failure proceeding from an opposite cause—not from excess of weight, but from the want of it. Prof. John Stuart Blackie's 'Messis Vitæ: Gleanings of Song from a Happy Life' (Macmillan) is inscribed to the students of the Scottish universities, and has for its motto that verse of St. Paul which bids men rejoice altogether. So far, so good; there is something fine in discovering that while the charming scenery of the Isle of Wight produces only the despairing strains of Lord Tennyson, the somewhat gloomy streets of Edinburgh can rear so jocund an Emeritus Professor. But when we turn the pages, we find only the lighter profusions of that somewhat heavily girded muse which gave us 'The Wise Men of Greece' in verse; and which translated only the first part of 'Faust,' on the avowed ground that the second part was of little value. For this volume the good Professor writes hymns, and he writes odes to backgammon, and he duly commemorates "an academy for young ladies at Clapham, under the able superintendence of Miss Pipe"; and he leaves, after all, a renewed impression of the enchanted land that Scotland yet remains for us, since even its later and comparatively uninspired bards find a theme inexhaustible in its braes and Bens.

Mrs. Emily Pfeiffer in her 'Sonnets' (London: Field & Tuer: New York: Scribner & Welford) sings of Scotland also, and of many other lands. It is curious that while Mrs. Hemans, the ever graceful and melodious, is now neglected, so poor a copy of her as Mrs. Pfeiffer should be able to preface her book of poems with four pages of private puffs from authors known and unknown; the more especially as the Saturday Review has just denounced this nefarious practice as something wholly American, and has said that it "almost exceeds what the European mind can conceive of in the way of audacity." More curious still is the fact that while Mrs. Pfeiffer gives us Kassandra and Klytemnestra in the latest approved form, yet neither she nor her proof-readers can spell correctly the English authors whom she celebrates, but they give us "Carlysle," with a superfluous s, and "Mathew Arnold" with a deficient t (pp. 9, 13). The sonnets themselves are graceful and often pleasing; but are sometimes constructed in a lyric measure singularly remote from either the Italian or the Shaksperian form—perhaps in this case to give something of the lilt of Scottish verse:

> "Clouds that gather round Loch Katrine
> I know not which is the earth or sky." (P. 55.)

Those who remember among Carlyle's early critical essays his exposition of the life and poetry of the German Werner—or, in Mme. de Staël's 'L'Allemagne,' the whole chapter given to this once famous author—will have a certain retrospective pleasure in the translation (by E. A. M. Lewis) of his chief dramatic poem, 'The Templars in Cyprus' (London: Bohn; New York: Scribner & Welford). It is true, as Carlyle reported, that the characteristics of this work are "tawdry splendors and tumid grandiloquence, and mere playhouse thunder and lightning"; and it justifies Jean Paul in his remark that the good Werner had fallen into a poetical fermenting-vat (Gährbottich). But this still gives it a certain historic interest; and the full translation, although less vigorous than the specimen passages given by Carlyle, may be pronounced quite worth reading, though not likely to resuscitate the dead fame of the German theosophist.

If we find ourselves dwelling more at length, in this paper, on English than on American verse, it is because the recent transatlantic yield has certainly been richer than that upon our own soil. It is not always thus—there are times when the balance inclines the other way—but with the best wish to marshal our American contingent in its full dignity, we find a poverty of resource. Most of the American books of poetry, since Christmas, have been of the kind most discouraging to the reviewer—of the "ower gude for banning and ower bad for blessing" description; they are by authors who have not yet won their spurs, and are not very actively or successfully engaged in winning them. The most attractive of these volumes are those made up of selections, as the capital 'Ballads of Books' chosen by Brander Matthews (Coombes), an admirable piece of literary work in selection and annotation; or the 'Bugle Echoes: a Collection of Poems of the Civil War, Northern and Southern,' edited by Francis F. Browne (White, Stokes & Allen). This book, though unattractive on the outside, contains the best and best-edited collection we have seen of the poetic literature of both sides in the great conflict. Among the authors of single volumes, the best known, doubtless, is Anna Katharine Green, who has given us in 'Risini's Daughter' (Putnams) an Italian drama of the conventional form, but with something of that vigor which marked her 'Defence of the Bride.' In most cases these volumes show fluency in rhyming, and often a great persistency in adhering to a rather uninteresting subject. When some one asked Talleyrand how the Duke of Wellington spoke French, the courteous diplomat replied, "With the utmost intrepidity, as he does everything else." Intrepidity is the chief characteristic of Walter L. Campbell's long blank-verse poem called 'Civitas: the Romance of Our Nation's Life' (Putnams), in which Civitas and Libertas appear personified and hold long dialogues together. So there is intrepidity in George Lansing Raymond's 'Ballads of the Revolution' (Putnams)—ballads which have copious historical notes, but will surely never be recited or sung. The same quality is shown, above all, in a metrical essay, extending through three parts and nine cantos, entitled 'I Am that I Am: the Philosophic Basis of the Christian Faith,' by E. A. Warriner (Boston: Cupples, Upham & Co.). We take one verse from this astonishing production:

> "If Unity, 'tis Unities enclosed;
> If Endlessness, must endless Things contain;
> If Infinite, of Infinites composed.
> Idea of All were limited and vain,
> Except as Being's Being we explain.
> I is I Am, if it exist at all;
> Hence, it were nothing, if there were no twain.
> One is I, Am, and That—each cardinal—
> Each I Am That—a One in Three original."
> (P. 44.)

It seems ungracious to complain of any author for too great facility and too uniform a sweetness in versifying; but the impression produced by the Rev. Henry Bernard Carpenter's 'Liber Amoris' (Boston: Ticknor) errs a little on this side. The author is clearly a person of exceedingly poetic mind, and one of those who take delight in their work; he shows thought and tenderness, but his book cloys upon the palate. The mere redundancy of alliteration shows a certain weakness of ear; the following is an example, taken almost at random, in which we italicize the recurring sounds:

> "In silken scarf and vest, or now a page,
> With girlish face, fair hair, and lissom limb,
> Or troubadour with slow caressing hand,
> That, flingering up the lute-string, spilled some drops
> Of his love lay long treasured. And with these > Were tender, fearful maidens, many a one,
> And many a lovelorn man, and some that loved,
> And ladies lily-necked who laughed and leaned
> Across the crimson cloth that overflowed
> The balconies, while now and then a knight
> Came near with helm in hand, and bowed the knee,
> And begged with yearning look a blessing bright
> From the starred eyes of dame and damosel."
> (P. 83.)

Here are thirteen lines, only two of which are free from the most obvious and palpable alliterations. No sweetness or smoothness can redeem blank verse from the fatigue produced in the reader's mind by the constant use of a device so elementary. Tennyson, who seems Mr. Carpenter's model, used alliteration with no such crude profuseness. The tone of feeling throughout the poem is refined and dignified; but it was a pity to borrow for it the name of Hazlitt's profoundest and therefore best-remembered work.

The inherent and still inexplicable difficulty of making an effective poem out of Indian legends, was never shown more strikingly than in the costly "Artists' Proof Edition" of Mr. J. H. McNaughton's elaborate poem of 'Onnalinda.' Though it bears the imprint of Kegan Paul & Co. (London), the whole work was apparently executed in this country; and few of our bards have seen their productions so luxuriously enshrined. Some of the smaller illustrations, on rice paper, are really noticeable bits of art, while the larger ones are usually marred by the remoteness of the heroine from any Indian or even half-breed type. Of the poet it can only be said that he has failed where all others—unless we except Longfellow—have failed, and that there is no life in his poem. The French-Canadian traditions are more easily handled, it would seem, than the purely Indian; and Mr. George Martin, a Canadian, has made an humbler and more successful effort at romance in his 'Marguerite; or, The Isle of Demons' (Montreal: Dawson). Even this is tinged with melodrama. The picturesque history of early French exploration has been well handled in prose, but has not yet got fairly into poetry. Doubtless its time will come; these tales only await their minstrel, as the New England legends waited for Whittier, and the traditions of the Hudson River for Irving.

In the volume of Southern stories called 'Rodman the Keeper,' Miss Woolson presents a panoramic view of a country and people still shivering with the horror of a destructive war. The inherent gloom of the theme is modified by the author's preference of pathetic incidents to those entirely heart-rending and shocking, and by her happy way of catching every gleam of humor in a forlorn situation. She has treated events and people almost inviting hysterical emotion with the reserve that makes for strength, and that moderation which is an essential of beauty in literature. Her characters are real outgrowths of their exceptional conditions, and only in the description of a gorgeous and luxurious prima donna has she departed from life, drawing for a figure upon conventional fiction and popular imagination. Every story has a fine idea and meaning, expressed with singular grace, sincerity, and charm. There is much that appeals to both intellect and sympathy, and not a line that offends the taste. The author's attitude is of one who, looking at her world, writes what she sees, thinks, and feels, quite free from any desire to distort for sentimental purposes, or to pander to prejudice. Paradoxical as it sounds, the chief excellence of her work, infused with a lovable personality, is its dispassionate impersonality.

Mrs. Whitney's 'Homespun Yarns,' on the contrary, are all twisted to one issue—that is, to display her intimate knowledge of the views and ways of Divine Providence. That a young girl's cloth is sufficient for her coat; that a housewife's pickles are salted to taste; that lovers unite or separate—all these interesting little mundane matters are referred to the direct interposition of God. Mrs. Whitney no more means to be irreverent than she means to be funny. She has been writing in this fashion for so many years that she doubtless feels herself familiar with Deity, without any diminution of awe. The Greeks indulged in much indecorous levity about their gods, but, none the less, in pestilence and in war, they prayed and made sacrifice with fervor, being probably cheered and comforted by the ceremonies. Mrs. Whitney's constant devotion to a literal deus ex machina burdens her stories with an artificiality which is intensified by the studied affectation of her style. The people who read them (and they are not few, are still bound to the dark ages of our fiction. They want the supernatural, the unnatural; and their enjoyment of both in large doses is so keen that it is almost a pity to say a word which may, by chance, disturb it.

In the stories collected under the title 'In the Wrong Paradise,' Mr. Lang yokes science and fiction very cleverly. Science is really the working horse, but gets little of the glory. The scholarship without which the stories could not have been written, is so cunningly concealed that no one, after reading them, will be vexed by the suspicion that he has swallowed a gilded pill. They may easily pass for genuine works of the imagination, or for frivolous fancies of an irresponsible, cheerfully cynical man of the world. It might be difficult to persuade many good people that Mr. Lang ever had a serious thought, except the unrighteous one of ridiculing missionaries and foreign missions in the person of the Rev. Thomas Gowles, and in his adventures among the Phæacians. The Rev. Gowles is indeed rather a bitter caricature, but some measure of his cant, ignorance, and conceit is unfortunately too frequently found in those who undertake to Christianize the heathen, whether at home or abroad. In the end of "Phæacia," which is the scene of Mr. Gowles's entertaining activity, Mr. Lang makes capital use of his researches into the habits of primitive man, as well as of the mythical island sung by Homer. "The First Radical" introduces successfully a Troglodyte gentleman among the heroes of romance. In several instances the results of recent psychological theorizing are set forth—most amusingly, perhaps, in the interview with the hereditary spectre of Castle Perilous. "In the Wrong Paradise" is weak and dull, losing point through extravagance. It is the only story which could be advantageously left out of a volume not inferior to the best French and American work of a similar kind.

In 'The Monarch of Dreams' Mr. Higginson plunges rashly into the elusive mystery of visions of the night. Francis Ayrault, who devotes his life to regulating his dreams, having imperfectly succeeded, seems in the end willing to die in order to get rid of the regularly recurring nightly vision which he has been at such pains to summon. With this exhibition of psychological possibilities the author seems so combine an ethical allegory, for, while Ayrault is so purposely busy with shadows, he misses a great opportunity for useful, practical action. It is necessary in this case to qualify comment with the word "seems," for, in the short sketch found worthy of cloth and gilt, nothing is clear but the obscurity both of Ayrault and the author.

The keynote of the twelve stories in 'The Sentimental Calendar' is, naturally, sentiment, and one of the prettiest touches of sentiment is the reason given for calling them "Funny Stories." The author's guiding principle of narration is, as it should be, suggestion rather than direct statement. But sometimes the suggestion is so delicate, or indefinite, or remote that the reader's imagination or sensibilities are worked very hard to catch it. For the same reason several of the stories fall short of effectiveness, are decidedly flat and unprofitable. The most noticeably incomplete are "The Bells of Avalon," the allegorical "Seven Lights of Asia," and "The First Love-Letter." But in several others, particularly in "Mrs. Knollys," both the beauty of the principle and the author's ability to control it are illustrated. Though at times a too pronounced literary manner is perceptible, a conscious effort for unconsciousness, there run through the sketches strains of gentleness and tenderness, with flashes of worldly wit and fun, which help to make a very attractive style.

'A Question of Identity,' little more than a short story, is written apparently with intention to compliment highly the reader's intelligence—that is, to permit him to construct any edifice he may please on the architectural hints furnished by the author. Here any one who may care is provided with a life-long puzzle, to decide which of the precious twin daughters of a Polish musician opportunely chose an isolated New England village to die in. Meaning to arrive at a profound conundrum, and there leave off, the author should, in justice to himself, have so arranged preliminary matter that one or two people, at least, might transfer their anxiety about the 'Lady or the Tiger' to his twins. His oversight is fatal. The story is, seriously, a bad example of useless work in fiction. Fortunately its worst possible effect is to irritate the person who, relying on the very good reputation of the series in which it appears, may happen to buy it.

It is certainly not more useless and destructive of the hope that novel-writing is gradually passing into the hands of competent and skilled laborers, than are 'Sons and Daughters' and 'Taken by Siege.' In neither of these is there any attempt to hold the reader's interest by plot, that is, by mystery or exciting adventure. The scenes are in America, the people every-day people, wherefore it is fair to assume that the authors are presenting to us studies of contemporary American life. 'Sons and Daughters' is the more pretentious of the two, and the failure of the author to justify his experiment is most noticeable. The novelist who devotes himself to the portraiture of individual character tacitly admits nowadays that he is bidding for the favor of the more intelligent public. His readers are perfectly willing to assist in picking any number of characters to pieces, but they demand in return the impression that they have made at least one intimate acquaintance—not necessarily a remarkable one, but such a one as they are compelled to recognize as a fellow-mortal. They may be ashamed of the recognition, or indignant, or, by great good luck, delighted; but, if the kinship be acknowledged, the author has done his work well and is, so to speak, worthy of his hire. There is, however, no such reward in store for those who wearily plod along with the 'Sons and Daughters' of a suburb of Philadelphia. The impossible creatures of the vanishing romance fulfilled their mission, such as it was, much more satisfactorily than do these dreary and insipid misrepresentations of actual life and thought.

In 'Taken by Siege,' though the scene is New York, and the people those of whose actual life and possibilities knowledge is not absolutely inaccessible, the happenings are phenomenal. We are asked to believe that the whole town quivered with excitement over the appearance of a singer (an American at that) in a new opera. We are refreshed with the spectacle of a country youth jumping, after a few months as occasional reporter, plump into the chair of foreign editor of a very great daily. Thence a couple of flying leaps land him in the shoes of the editor-in-chief. We are compelled to conclude by inference that a woman is not really virtuous until she shall have become première of the ballet, and whirled wonderfully on tiptoe before an hysterically applausive multitude. The case, it will be seen, is not one of imagination lacking, only of imagination misapplied. Properly to display the talent wasted in 'Taken by Siege,' the scene chosen should be a thoroughly out-of-the-way place, such as the "Lakes of the Torrible Zone, or the Hills of the Chaukley Bore."

'A Year in Eden' is saved from classification with this utterly meaningless fiction by the presence of two or three genuine and natural characters. They are not those to whom most care is given, and who, in the action, are most important. One is Professor Griswold, clever, pushing, plausible, and untrustworthy; the others are two old maids, the fine drawing of whose insignificance contrasts curiously with the woodenness and conventionality of those who ought to be significant. Women like the Misses Midleton—dignified, content, serene, for all their material poverty—are to be found in every small community, but very seldom have they been so delightfully shown to the world as by Miss Preston. The only excuse for the intrigue, an exceptionally disgraceful one even outside of Eden, is that it brings out the finest points of these sweet old gentlewomen. The disgrace of their niece's flight with a "married, middle-aged man" was needed even to suggest to them that such a thing could be; how it could be in their own set, among their own flesh and blood, they would never understand. Nor, from the author's delineation, does the reader understand; he can only accept, with the fulness of worldly knowledge, the possibility. The passion that might impel a man of fashion to a socially destructive step does not exist in the well-dressed stick that came as the serpent into Eden. For the woman's part in the affair there is no reason, excepting that an Italian-Yankee may be expected to be unbalanced, and that the name "Monza" may impose an obligation to be shocking.

'The Squire of Sandal-Side' is not likely to increase the good reputation which Mrs. Barr has been steadily achieving since the publication of 'Jan Vedder's Wife.' This is the first instance where her grasp of her scene, circumstances, and character is feeble. The introduction of an East Indian cousin into the north-country household in order to stir up dissension is an awkward expedient, and the worn device for defeating the villain implies exhausted ingenuity. The Squire, his younger daughter, and the Latriggs are well within Mrs. Barr's scope, but she has not sustained them with her usual vigor and accuracy. Even the motives for the loves, friendships, and enmities, which she has hitherto been able to reveal with unequivocal clearness, are vague and inconsistent.

The translation of Paul Lindau's story, under the title 'Klaus Bewer's Wife,' is worth reading, if it were only to contemplate the finished portrait of "Katie Schöne," whom Bewer so rashly married. Katie's notion of the value of truth was crude, and, being a concert-hall singer, her propensities were vagabond. Nevertheless, she had no desire to offend her conventional husband, or to outrage the fine society to which she unexpectedly found herself elevated. But the introduction of very respectable relations into her own house, her husband's delight in their company, and her own discomfort, quite upset her equanamity, driving her to the active antagonism which resulted fatally to Bewer. Katie's character is so completely disclosed by her acts and words, with the smallest amount of description, that misunderstanding is impossible. The rest of the characters are interesting and life-like, save the Americans, who are of a kind that Americans never see.

Siam: or, the Heart of Farther India. By Mary L. Cort. A. D. F. Randolph & Co. Map, pp. x., 399. 12mo.

SIAM, or Muang Thai, "the kingdom of the free," as the people themselves, with a strange irony, call it, occupies a position in the East very similar to that of Belgium in Europe. Nearly surrounded by the possessions of France and Great Britain, it owes its present independence to the conflicting interests of these two nations. France, indeed, has not concealed her desire to divide the kingdom with Great Britain, the mountains forming the water-shed of the Menam and Mekong being the proposed boundary. The latter Power, however, would oppose this high-handed measure, if for no other reason, from a determination not to have the former for a neighbor. The commercial interests of the two are equally divergent. The French have long wished to cut a ship canal through the Malayan Peninsula, thereby bringing Saigon and Bangkok a thousand miles nearer Marseilles. As this enterprise would at the same time divert the China trade from the Straits, it is unfavorably regarded by the English, while the projected French railway from Saigon through Siam to the borders of Yunnan directly conflicts with the English scheme for a railway between Burmah and China, the greater part of which would also run through Siam.

The author of this work, an American missionary, has lived for the past twelve years in Siam, but does not throw much light on points of international significance. In regard to the population she says: "We have never heard her people numbered higher than ten millions, and sober, matter-of-fact minds are apt to say six or eight millions." This is the commonly received estimate, the recently published volume of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' giving the same figures. But Mr. A. R. Colquhon, the well-known traveller, who has made a special study of the country in connection with the proposed railway through it, says on good authority that this is simply the number of the males between the ages of twenty and seventy, and that the true figures, according to the last census, are "about thirty-eight millions." Probably the greatest obstacle to the growth of Siam is the fact that a very large proportion of the people are slaves, mainly for debt, "a debtor being able," according to a recent writer, "to sell himself, wife or children, or nephews or nieces, their freedom being recoverable on payment of the debt." The debasing effect of this custom was fully recognized by the present King, and one of his first acts on assuming power, fifteen years ago, was to decree the gradual abolition of slavery in his immediate dominions. One would like to know how far this decree has been carried out, and what influence it has had, if any, upon the people, and whether measures have been taken to check the slave-hunting raids on the hill tribes; but on these points, which one would naturally suppose would be of the first importance to the missionaries, Miss Cort gives us absolutely no information. There are other obscure subjects, as the tenure of land, the methods of village government, taxation, the laws, and the different races among the people, but to our knowledge of these she adds nothing. Her book is, in fact, not a description of the country as a whole, but chiefly of Siam as it is seen in Bangkok.

In her account of this place she exceeds in fulness of detail all previous writers, and enables the reader to realize very vividly the appearance of and manner of life in this "Venice of the East." As in all Eastern seaboard cities, there is a strange mingling of the two civilizations, the old and the new. The ordinary life is unchanged. The people dress the same and live in the same kind of houses and eat the same food as their ancestors have done for centuries. The customs attending birth, marriage, and death are unaltered. But the palaces are lighted with gas and electricity, and the palm-leaf huts with kerosene lamps, while in the temples the priests cook their food on American oil stoves. The telegraph and telephone are in active operation, and there are street letter-boxes, the bottoms of which "are made of sandal-wood, to impart fragrance to the missives, and thereby cultivate a taste for letters." The festivals and holidays are celebrated with the same amusements as of old—the open-air theatre, dances, exhibitions of jugglers, fireworks, gorgeous idol processions—and at the same time in the King's garden native bands of music play modern airs while his guests amuse themselves with croquet and lawn tennis. The cremation of the Queen and her infant daughter in 1881, ordered in every particular "according to ancient royal custom," was closely followed by a "Centennial Exposition" of Siamese products and manufactures, among the accompanying ceremonies of which were the laying the foundation of a "Palace of Justice" and the rededication of the famous temple of the "Emerald Idol." The cult of the white elephant alone of old customs seems to be gradually becoming a thing of the past. Nearly every writer on Siam has dwelt upon the magnificence of the surroundings of this "symbol of kingly authority and prosperity." But our author says: "There are five white elephants now. I visited the stable of the latest arrival, and found it just the same as other stables, dingy and dirty, and the illustrious captive was confined and treated, to all appearances, in the usual way. I think it is time the popular fallacy about feeding the white elephant from gold dishes and keeping him in regal splendor was exploded. Except on state occasions it has no foundation in fact."

The young King, Mrs. Leonowens's pupil, appears from Miss Cort's interesting account of him to be a very intelligent man, who is honestly anxious to promote the welfare of his subjects in every way. Like the late King, his father, he is an author, having among other things translated the 'Arabian Nights,' and takes a great interest in popular education. While adhering steadfastly to Buddhism, he gives perfect liberty to the American missionaries to carry on their work, and has aided with a gift of money in the building of one of their school-houses. At a recent interview with the missionaries, one of them expressed a wish that Siam might become Christian, for "'rulers and their subjects in Christian lands are much happier because of Christianity.' The King laughing rejoined, 'I think that the Czar of Russia is not so happy as the King of Siam.'" There are several chapters relating to the work of the missionaries, from which we gather that their direct success in making converts has not been very great, but their indirect success—through their schools, their medical missions, and their influence upon the king and his councillors—has been very satisfactory. For the descriptions of the palace, the monasteries, the homes of the common people, their religion, holidays and festivals, and especially the ceremonies of the last royal cremation, we must refer our readers to the book itself, only remarking that the author takes occasion to correct the popular impression that the building erected for the cremation, whose marvellous beauty of design and ornamentation has perhaps never been exceeded, is burnt. Before the fire was lighted, all the precious and costly things were taken from the altar on which the bodies lay. The outer golden urns or caskets were removed, and the inner "copper ones covered by others made of carved sandal-wood, very delicate and beautiful, and festooned with garlands of fresh flowers." After the King had "ignited the fuse, . . . men stood by watching the fire and dashing water upon it, to prevent the flames from rising too high and destroying the Pramane. The building is never burned. They are careful that nothing is consumed but the wood and the remains."

There are also chapters on Petchaburee and its environs, a town about ninety miles to the south-west of Bangkok, and upon the tributary kingdom of Laos and the captive Laosians in Siam proper. Though the author narrates comparatively few personal experiences (as to which her work differs greatly from that of Mrs. Leonowens), and is packed full of information, yet she is scarcely ever dull. It may be well to call her attention to the fact that the fine description of the approach to Bangkok, which she quotes and attributes to Bayard Taylor, was written by the late Rev. George B. Bacon, the editor of 'Siam, the Land of the White Elephant.'

Village Photographs. By Augusta Larned. Henry Holt & Co. 1887.

THIS volume illustrates the fact that a village offers as good opportunities for the observation of human nature, within limits, as does the city, with the added advantage of a country sincerity and hardiness of character. This particular village is of the rural New England type. Its inhabitants have a familiar look as they come before us in turn. There are the judge, the jack-of-all-trades, the young man of genius without an occupation, the recluse with a dark romance, the ne'er-do-well, and the good doctor, who belongs to the group in which Holmes delights, and who is drawn with a skill not inferior to his own. There are women of all varieties of weakness and strength of mind, schoolmistresses, old maids, flirts, widows, in an abundance that accurately indicates, one thinks, the surplus of the sex. It is a long story that the author tells. She has exhausted the field, not in the sense of telling all that is to be known, but in leaving out no detail that belongs to the general impression. A good many life-histories are related, not as the novelist writes them, but in the way in which they are really known to the people of the town. One lives in the place, as he reads, and finds out that there is no secrecy possible for any of its inhabitants. Sooner or later even the passing stranger learns their affairs from start to finish. The description of these human matters makes the bulk of the book, though the course of the seasons and the natural features of the woods and mountain and "the pine barrens" are utilized to keep a country atmosphere always present. The rustics are true rustics, true Yankees; and whoever likes the "simple annals of the poor" will find this volume full of reality, and sometimes touched with homely pathos.

The Diversions of a Book-Worm. By J. Rogers Rees. George J. Coombes. 1887.

In this delightfully printed volume Mr. Rees gives the public a second welcome to his library corner, where sits as true a lover of books as ever was. It is some months only since his former work, 'The Pleasures of a Book-Worm,' was noticed by us, and these later 'Diversions' are a continuation, in the same style, of the old papers, but with a more familiar touch, as if the author were better acquainted with the reader. The nook he describes as his abode is a very attractive one; the talk about books, his own notes on authors' habits and on some literary associations with his own copies of certain famous works, make an agreeable kind of reading for the literary connoisseur. As in the previous collection, the narrative lingers most often about the group of the Lakers and of Lamb and his London friends, but not tediously. An open hospitality is extended to Americans by Mr. Rees, whose acquaintance with our authors and their studies is real and intimate to a degree rare among the English; and several pages are filled with Americana in consequence. An appendix gives some interesting notes upon famous and costly illustrated books, especially Count Bastard's 'Peintures et Ornements des Manuscrits,' of which the French part only is to cost probably £3,678 per copy, and the price of the whole cannot fail to reach about £11,000, if completed on a moderate scale; but why Mr. Rees removed these pages to an appendix is inexplicable.

Walks and Talks in the Geological Field. By Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology and Palæontology in the University of Michigan. 8vo, pp. 329. New York: Chautauqua Press. 1886.

In this little book the author endeavors to present some of the more important general truths of geology in an informal way. In about fifty hypothetical excursions or from imaginary points of view he proceeds to lecture on a great variety of subjects which are likely to interest the general reader. These subjects are, on the whole, well chosen, and the illustrations of general principles show that the author has a very extended knowledge of the details of the science. It is only when he talks about such matters as the "whirling fire mist," i. e., the nebulous pre-geological stage of the earth, or the "primeval storm," as he terms the first coming of the oceans on the earth's surface, that he fails to be instructive. In these parts of his work purely imaginary pictures take the place of facts, and the author runs riot through a singularly lurid world.

The style of the book is that which is known as the familiar—a very dangerous fashion for all but the greatest masters of speech. The aim is worthy, for by this familiarity the author seeks to keep near to his reader, sacrificing his own dignity—prancing, so to speak, on his hobby—that the solemn nature of his office may not be suspected, at least until the dose of information has been well administered. His first words show the method and its fashion: "Come, John and Jennie—come, George and Julia—let us have a talk about GEOLOGY. Come, John's mother and aunt—come, everybody that wishes—we shall find some of the most delightful things to talk about which anybody ever heard of." It is not all like this. There is much in the way of excellent description of natural phenomena, too often marred by the same unhappy straining after the picturesque and the artless. We are quite sure that neither "John nor Jennie" is likely to be any more interested in "cosmic dust" or the "seeds of worlds" on account of the antics with which the naturally grave professor prefaces his lecture on those subjects. We fear that they will be so absorbed in wonder at the ways of the teacher that they will not grasp the "cosmic dust" at all. These little ones have a very solemn way with serious subjects.

The Bishops in the Tower. A Record of Stirring Events affecting the Church and Nonconformists from the Restoration to the Revolution. By Herbert Mortimer Luckock, D.D., Canon of Ely, etc. Thomas Whitaker. 1887. 12mo, pp. 225.

Dr. Luckock's 'Bishops in the Tower' consists of a course of eight lectures delivered in Ely Cathedral upon a plan of the late Bishop Woodford, "of having lectures on church history and subjects of a kindred nature delivered from time to time within the Cathedral." This course was also delivered in London in two places. The lectures contain a great deal more than the title promises, being, in fact, a tolerably complete account of ecclesiastical relations from the time of the Restoration. The "somewhat fanciful" title given to the book was "adopted because the imprisonment of the Bishops was an act in which the absolutism and Romeward policy of the restored Stuarts culminated; it was an event, too, which contributed immediately to their downfall, and so far may well be considered as the chief point of interest and importance in the period with which these pages are occupied." The book is one to be highly commended. The material is selected with good judgment, the story is told in an animated and interesting style, and the temper of the writer is at once earnest and liberal. The lectures well deserved to be put in this permanent form.

Young People's History of Ireland. By George M. Towle. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

This is an interesting sketch of Irish history—a record too bad and broken ever to be popular with young people. The engravings are good of their kind. More dates would have been desirable, and greater uniform care should have been exercised in clear statements of fact. From an expression on page 224 the reader might suppose that the present poor-house system was established in the early part of the eighteenth instead of the present century. "At one period its population was somewhat over 100,000" (referring to Dublin in the last century) implies that it has now fallen away in numbers, instead of containing 300,000. The science of history is now studied in a broad enough spirit to lead us to expect that in a work such as this there should be some reference to the fact that the treatment to which Ireland was subjected for some centuries was but one phase of the religious war being waged over Europe; and that if Catholicism and Catholics suffered in Ireland, Protestantism and Protestants were subjected to even more ferocious and unscrupulous persecution in other countries. The statement of the truth in this regard would tend to prevent the growth of bitter and narrow feelings to which children, of all readers of history, are most prone.

The Dogaressa. By W. G. Melmontí. Translated by Clare Brune. With preface by George Augustus Sala. London: Remington & Co.; New York: Scribner & Welford.

Which of the two to whom 'The Dogaressa' owes its English guise is responsible for its deshabille, it is hard to say without a more careful comparison of the translation and original than the substance of the book merits; but for the slovenliness and incompetence of the translation, which can by no possibility convey an idea of the original, Clare Brune alone can be responsible. The book is at best poor stuff—mere book-making. The body of it is a mass of information, collected without much, if any, independent research, pitchforked together with little regard to system or sequence, dealing copiously with periods of which we know sufficient, and very sparingly with those which require research and would repay it. As an example of the art writing, we will only quote one passage, on Giorgione:

"He knew how to give a distinct characteristic to his women's fascinating forms, and he also preserved a calm imagination amidst indecency. He delineated female figures with a thousand charms, and over them was diffused a sort of golden shade; the amber-colored flesh stands out from the landscape which serves it for a background, and is painted with pleasing simplicity. The slopes are covered with vineyards, with green pastures, and disappear behind a veil of light vapors; there is nothing arid in the soil, nothing sad in the sky, and yet in those hills that are outlined on the azure heavens, and in that plain which blends with the horizon, there is a vague and indefinite sadness which contrasts oddly with the nude limbs of the women trembling with delight."

As examples of the translation, take the following. The Doge Orseolo is represented as thinking "of restoring Grado and of finishing the Ducal Palace and the Basilisk of St. Mark." Of the execution of Marino Faliero it is written: "The said Doge's head was cut off before he came down the staircase. . . . The doors being thrown open, the people rushed in to behold the body of the Doge. All Faliero's property was confiscated to the State, with the exception of two thousand ducats, of which he was allowed the disposal." On one page we find Anthony di Murano (three times), Antony Murano (once), and Antonio da Murano (once); in another place, Giovanni of Germany and John of Germany; Ghiotto and Giotto; Blanche Capello twice and Bianca once on the same page again; Nicolo Pisano and Nicholas Pisano, and so on all the way through. Among the misprints is Andrea Diandoo for Dandolo. When a word in the Italian puzzles the translator, it is put in Italian. Italian quotations are sometimes unintelligible, and Latin quotations are given untranslated, with such confusion as can be imagined.

The preface by Mr. Sala seems to have been written without his having read the book, and almost without reference to it, and without a word of explanation for the English reader as to who or what the author is, and (quite in keeping with the book) seems to have been added only to put Sala's name in the announcement of the publication.

Last Evening with Allston, and Other Papers. By Elizabeth P. Peabody. Boston: D. Lothrop & Co.

This volume carries the reader back to a former generation. The papers which fill it are taken from periodicals; a review of 'The Marble Faun' dates as late as 1869, but the bulk of the matter belongs before the war, and all of it breathes the peculiar intellectual atmosphere of "the New England Renaissance" of 1843. Even the chapter upon Allston, though primarily biographical, has the characteristics of the time deeply impressed upon it; and in the remainder of the collection the large place held by discussions of education, the recurring references to the Dorian Greeks and the Triune-Apollo system, the treatment of the nature-myth in mythology and history, and also of the parallelism of thought in pagan and Christian religion, and in general the spirit of speculation and of reform for which the Dial stood, are signs of a past literary epoch. The interesting memoir of Kossuth's sister, whose character belongs to a high ideal of womanhood, also indicates how much this volume is a work of past days and not to be reckoned as current literature. To many readers, probably, its phrases and attitudes of mind are intelligible only by an effort if at all, so closely are they connected with the modes of thinking of which Brook Farm was the most concrete practical expression. One is struck in these articles by the interest exhibited in new ideas, the mental energy of their assimilation, and by the hopefulness and vigor of the appeal to integrate the new knowledge in a new "education" which should be to the new age what salvation was to the old. The air was bracing to the mind, at all events, in those days, and one might go far in these later times of more woman's rights and female colleges without number, and not find a book by a woman, so strongly intellectual and exhibiting such difficult study as these old papers by Miss Peabody. They are an honorable record of mental life, and are besides a living illustration of the New England movement which Emerson's works and fame make of a more enduring interest. A second volume is promised.

"The writer has three of the best gifts of the novelist—imagination, perception, and humor. Calista is indescribably droll. . . . The clearness of the portraitures, the drollery of some of the situations, the truthful representations of village life, and the spirit and freshness of the author's manner," In these terms the New York Tribune commends the new novel,

BY DOROTHEA ROBERTS.

With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, gilt tops, $2.25.

"A very interesting volume. . . . A perusal of this work will prove a capital tonic to any dyspeptic democrat who has an idea that all kings and scions of royalty do is to indulge in a round of frivolous festivities and careless pleasures. . . . The reader will find in this volume an abundance of attractive and interesting information, which will do much to abate many popular prejudices, and prove that where duty is the ruling motive of action, the members of a royal family can do much to elevate a people and exalt a state."—The Nottingham Journal.

"The work combines very happily the statement of scientific principles with due regard for financial and other practical considerations; and it is written in an easy, popular style that should render its perusal most pleasurable for any intelligent agriculturist, however slight his acquaintance with chemical terminology. It is a very valuable work."—Cultivator and Country Gentleman.

"The work is so admirably full of experiment and suggestion, yet so simple, that we cannot but feel that its contents have been too long kept from the public. The Nation.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1887.

The Week.

THE political revolution which was accomplished in Rhode Island on Wednesday week has, indeed, a national significance, but not in the sense which the Republican managers and newspapers insisted upon in the campaign that preceded the election. By itself the real question involved in the contest was as purely local as it could possibly be. It was simply whether or not the honest people of the State would consent to be governed longer by a corrupt political Machine with a defaulter for its Boss. What did professedly respectable Republican leaders in the party do? Some of them kept quiet, and refused to take any part in the campaign. Not so Senator Aldrich. He took the field in person, and called to his aid from outside the State Henry Cabot Lodge of Boston, the Boston Journal, and the New York Tribune. Together they began a tremendous clatter about the national issues at stake in the contest. Not a word of defence could they offer for the Machine or its boss, but they were all sure that the movement for his overthrow was a free-trade conspiracy, and that if it succeeded, both the Republican party and the protective system were doomed. On the issues thus presented by the Republicans, the State has gone Democratic for the first time in a quarter of a century. It has elected a Democratic Governor and nearly an entire State ticket by clear majorities over all. The Republican pluralities for Governor of 6,334 in 1884, 3,989 in 1885, and 4,396 in 1886, now give place to a Democratic majority of 973. All the Democratic candidates have handsome pluralities, and the Democrats in the Legislature have a clear majority of nine on joint ballot. Last year the Republicans had 80 majority in the Legislature. The national significance of a revolution like this is unmistakable. It must be evident to the Republicans everywhere that the country has swung into a new epoch.

The vote for State officers in Michigan shows that it must be considered a close State in 1888. The Republicans had clearly the stronger judicial ticket, and the Democrats no longer had the support of the Greenbackers in a fusion, as had been the case for several years previously. Nevertheless, the plurality of the Republican ticket over the Democratic does not much exceed the 7,500 of last fall over the fusion ticket, and it looks as though the combined Democratic and Greenback vote this spring would exceed the Republican. This is a very different state of things from 1881, when these three parties last ran separate tickets, and the Republicans had nearly 55,000 plurality over the Democrats, and more than 21,000 over Democrats and Greenbackers together.

The municipal elections everywhere teach the same lesson, that the people can no longer be led around by the politicians. Cleveland, O., is naturally a Republican city by about 3,000 majority, but a Democrat has just been elected Mayor by about 3,000 majority, simply because Independent Republicans were disgusted with the Republican ring. "It was the victory of the people over the spoils-hunting politicians," says the Democratic organ, which enforces the moral for its own party in this refreshingly frank style: "The Plain Dealer takes occasion, therefore, to call attention to the magnificent victory of the Democrats of Cleveland, and to the contrast between the condition of the party here and in Cincinnati and Chicago, where evil counsels on the part of Democratic leaders and Democratic newspapers have brought the party to utter demoralization and wreck." Contrast this with the attitude of the organ of the defeated Republicans, the Leader. On the morning after the nomination of the Democratic candidate it said: "The nomination of Mr. Babcock was due to impulses and influences that, on a smaller scale, correspond to those which resulted in the nomination of Grover Cleveland for President," and warned all good Republicans to be on their guard against this insidious attempt of the Democracy "to introduce Mugwumpery into Cleveland." Then, after its own party had met the Democratic choice of a leading business man, never before a candidate for office, as a standard-bearer, by putting forward a hack politician of the baser sort, it endeavored to avert the foreseen result by dilating on the danger of allowing a party nomination, regularly obtained, to fail of full party suppport. The Republican loss of about 6,000 votes on election day must have opened the Leader's eyes to the fact that those "impulses and influences" of 1884 have suffered no lessening of efficiency, whether in nominating or in electing.

The New York Tribune's "special" from Cleveland, attributing Republican defeat to the alliance of the liquor element with the Democracy on account of a Republican city government having kept the saloons closed on Sunday, is in good keeping with what appears to be the settled policy of the Tribune just now, to explain all Republican disasters as due to the hostility of the rum power, but is particularly ludicrous in the case in hand. It was the Democratic Police Judge who first held that the city ordinance allowing the saloons to open after two o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday was invalid, and who began the work of fining and imprisoning the angry saloonists for violating the State law made operative by his decision. And it was a Republican Council that made haste, upon the demand of the liquor men, to pass an ordinance which should stand, and which, had it not come to grief in the Board of Aldermen, would have made lawful again the opening of saloons on Sunday.

On the morning of election day the Milwaukee Sentinel, which is strongly Republican in national politics, made an earnest appeal for the permanent establishment of the principle of non-partisanship in local elections, upon which the better class of men in both parties went that day to the polls, and, as the result proved, defeated the Socialist movement. The recent combination of Republicans and Democrats in Milwaukee was not non-partisan in the sense that candidates were selected solely with reference to fitness, for the Sentinel says that, "in order to satisfy partisans, pronounced Republicans and Democrats have been selected as candidates largely because rather than in spite of their partisan strength." At the same time such a union must needs show that men of both parties have the common aim of good government and the advancement of the best interests of the city, and give men an occasion to form a juster estimate of one another, and the Sentinel urges that the possible advantage of this combination should not be lost.

The result in East St. Louis shows that the people who are for law and order can always carry the day if they make up their minds to take the necessary trouble. At the time of the Missouri Pacific troubles last spring it seemed as though this suburb of St. Louis were a place given over beyond hope to the worst elements of the community, and as though the political gang which had long controlled it, could not be dislodged because there was not a sufficient reserve of character and independence among the voters. But the respectable men of both parties made up a citizens' ticket this spring, and it "swept everything before it."

The municipal election in Jacksonville, Fla., last week was another victory for non-partisanship, and showed that Mugwumpism is growing in the South as well as in the West. The ring which controlled the Democratic party having put forward a bad ticket, a citizens' movement was organized, and, with the efficient backing of the Times-Union, it was carried to success. The Mayor-elect, in response to a serenade, delivered a speech which shows that no mistake was made in selecting him as the leader. Among other things he said was this noteworthy declaration: "I shall know no one on account of his color and I shall make no distinctions. The colored man can get justice from me as well as the white. Whenever he deserves it I shall do him justice. Why? Because they have rallied around us in this fight and saved us from a government not of the people, but of a clique. They have rallied around the standard of good government with all the balance of the good citizens and assisted in this fight. Had it not been thus, the opposition would have overridden us and driven us from the field. But you all stayed by us, and Jacksonville will feel the effect of it." Moreover, he began living up to his declaration at once, as this striking statement from the Times-Union shows: "H. H. Baker and Moses Taylor, two worthy colored men, who were among those of their race in the party who serenaded Mayor Burbridge last evening, called at the Times-Union office as a committee appointed to acknowledge appreciation of the courtesy of Mayor Burbridge in including the colored men present in his invitation to the serenaders to enter his house and partake of refreshments. It was, they said, an incident which had never before occurred in their recollection, and they were very much pleased."

President Cleveland's letter to Mr. George Steele, the President of the American Fisheries Union, strongly confirms the impression that the aim of that organization has been to make just enough disturbance to secure for themselves a monopoly of the fish market in the United States, but not enough to interrupt the ordinary commercial relations between the two countries. The public will give just as much attention to the fisheries dispute as they are compelled to by their pecuniary interests, and no more. Each man is absorbed in his own private affairs, and so long as these are not molested by any action of the Government, the fisheries are a matter of no practical concern to him. They do not touch his conscience, like the liquor question or the slavery question. So he leaves the subject to the men at Washington whom he has hired to look after it. But if, as part and parcel of the fishery dispute, other business is thrown into confusion, if sales of goods are interrupted and purchases made more costly, there will be a general reckoning which cannot be advantageous to those who caused the Washington Treaty to be abrogated, thus needlessly plunging us into hot water again.

President Cleveland replies to Mr. Steele that he cannot undertake to restrict the operation of the retaliation act (if it becomes necessary to put it in force) to "prohibiting Canadian fish from entry into the ports of the United States," as Mr. Steele had kindly suggested. This, the President says, would be taking a low view of the importance of the question and of the dignity of the United States. It might be advisable, although the President does not suggest this, to prohibit the entry into our ports of any fish caught by Canadian fishermen serving in American vessels, in which case the Gloucester fleet would be shorn of two-thirds of its effective strength. It may be, and very likely will be, expedient to prohibit American vessels from going into Canadian ports for any purpose whatever, except for shelter in stress of weather. To limit the operation of the act to a new measure of "protection" to a particular trade would be putting upon the consumers of fish the entire burden and cost of the difficulty. It is gratifying to know that President Cleveland does not take so low a view of his public duties, and that he will not assent in advance to such an act of injustice. Indeed, his letter may be construed as a promise that when he does act he will contrive that the burden and cost shall be fairly distributed, and that no class or section shall get the advantage of any other class or section by reason of what is at best a serious public misfortune.

Judge Deady, of the United States District Court for Oregon, has given the first judicial decision under the Inter-State Commerce Law, holding that it is not a violation of the law for the Oregon and California Railroad, a corporation wholly within one State, to carry goods to Portland destined to San Francisco by a steamship line not under its control, at a less rate than is charged for carrying, the same distance or a shorter distance, the same goods not destined for shipment to points beyond on the steamship line. The decision is technically correct, and therefore legally correct. Any other decision would have been incorrect and illegal. The law does not include steamship lines or water carriage not controlled by, or under the same management with, the railway company concerned. It does not include, but expressly excludes, railways wholly within the limits of a single State. Yet the case at bar is one of the class of cases intended to be reached by the legislation in question. If the steamship line had happened to be under the same ownership and control as the Oregon and California R. R.—as in fact it was a few years ago—the law would have been operative upon both, and the Judge would have been compelled to decide the case differently. If the goods had been shipped to the same destination from some point on the roads of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, the decision would have been different, because this company does own and control the steamship line. But the latter company could also avoid the law by sending the goods from Portland to San Francisco by the Pacific Coast Steamship Line. So it appears that for transporting goods from any interior point in Oregon to San Francisco the law may be operative or not in the discretion of the railway managers, and that their discretion is legal and unimpeachable. This is an anomaly, but is not so impressive or far-reaching as that which the Commissioners have signalized by suspending the operation of the law for a period of ninety days on the Southern roads. This they have the right to do, undoubtedly. The right to suspend it on a particular road or in a particular case must include the right to suspend it in gross. The operation of the law has been suspended also on the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee Road for ninety days, and this action, while apparently justifiable, has given rise to much bickering at Chicago and Toledo.

Nearly all the Western papers are printing articles, both editorial and descriptive, concerning the "boom" in real estate. The St. Louis Globe Democrat makes it a feature of journalism, publishing in a single number, from twenty-two different points, telegrams and letters giving account of sales of lots, new buildings under construction, and the rapid accumulation of wealth by speculators in real estate. The excitement rages in the small towns as well as the large. Mount Carmel, Ill., Chanute and Paola, Kan., Booneville and Clinton, Mo., Las Vegas, N. M., and a multitude of places that have been seldom heard of a hundred miles from their respective court-houses, are booming in grand chorus, while the uproar at Little Rock, Ark., Wichita, Kan., and Fort Worth, Tex., is really deafening. The scenes in 'Change Alley at the time of the South Sea bubble, or in the Rue Quincampoix when John Law was the virtual sovereign of France, appear to be distributed and reënacted over a space of about 1,000 miles square in the West and South. Take Little Rock, for example. The Gazette of that place publishes a daily article on the "Boom," surmounted by thirteen splendid head lines. Without going into the body of the article—everybody being too busy to read the details—it can be learned that prices are firmer each day than they were the day before, that the number of recorded transfers was larger that day than it had ever been before; that A. B. had sold to C. D. for $5,000 what he had paid only $2,500 for a few days ago, and that the profit was made before any papers had passed; that the city authorities have made a contract for paving two miles of streets, and that Jay Gould has sold the Pine Bluff Railroad out of his left-hand pocket into his right-hand pocket, and has in contemplation many other trades of great prospective value to Little Rock.

It will occur to any man of mature years that he has heard this tale before, and perhaps more than once. The great real-estate boom of 1834-5-6, preceding the crash of 1837, will be recalled by a few. The speculations of 1854-5-6, prior to the collapse of 1857, are remembered by a greater number. The great advance in real estate that preceded the crisis of 1873 is too fresh to need more than a brief mention. The present boom is really the first of any magnitude that has affected real estate over a wide area since 1873. It is an observed fact that real estate is, of all kinds of property, the last to feel the impulse of what are called "good times," and also the last to succumb to the pressure of a commercial crisis. Other kinds of property must be bought and sold from day to day, whatever the prices may be. Real estate, being subject to no deterioration by the lapse of time, may be held as long as the owner can pay the taxes and the interest on mortgage if it is thus encumbered. Consequently there may be a business boom and a business reaction not felt by real estate in any way. Such a boom and reaction occurred in the period of 1879–1882, during which the real-estate market all over the country was remarkably quiescent, the only noticeable boom being in the Province of Manitoba. But a business revival cannot be of long duration without affecting land values; and when new land is really wanted for business uses, and when productive industry can afford to pay considerably higher prices for its use, the speculative fever is sure to rise as it appears to have risen now in the West and South. There is nothing to be said of the present "boom" except that some people will make money out of it while the fever continues, and others will lose when the reaction comes.

Mr. Powderly of the Knights of Labor, at a meeting in Philadelphia last Thursday, gave in his adhesion to the proposition of the Declaration of Independence that "all men were created equal and endowed with certain inalienable rights." He says this is correct and "the truth, instead of being a living lie as some men would have the people believe." Now, the Declaration of Independence was undoubtedly intended to cover the case of non-union as well as of union men—that is, of "scabs" as well as members. It meant that every man was entitled to enjoy life and liberty and pursue happiness in his own way, and not in the way of some other man, or of some assembly. We should like, therefore, to hear from the gentle Powderly what he thinks of the practice of trying to ruin people by boycotting them, and by hunting them out of employment, from shop to shop, to say nothing of hitting them with clubs and bricks, because they do not choose to join unions or become Knights. At the meeting in question he flaunted the American flag a good deal, and said that he and his friends were there as Americans; but we must remind him that the founders of the Government no more intended the flag to float over a pirate ship or a robber's cave than over an organization like the District Assembly 49, devoted largely to the persecution of the poor and helpless.

Gov. Green of New Jersey has learned that eternal vigilance is the price of demagogy as well as of liberty. He distinguished himself in his first message by talking greater nonsense on the Labor question than any other official in the country, save our own Gov. Hill, has ever indulged in. This presumably made him "solid" with the Labor vote. He forgot himself, however, a few days ago, and declined to preside over a meeting which the Irish citizens of Trenton called to protest against the new Coercion Bill in Parliament. When he heard that this refusal had angered the Irish voters, he sent a letter withdrawing it and consenting to preside. The effect of this transparent move to regain lost ground made the Irish voters more indignant than ever, and they threatened to get even with him by voting against the Governor's party in the municipal election. This election occurred on Monday, and the threat was so well carried out that the Republican candidate for Mayor was elected, for the first time in six years. Of course the Democrats put all the blame upon the Governor.

Senator Sherman sent a letter to the dinner of the Philadelphia Young Republicans on Monday which gave promise in its opening paragraph of presenting some progressive ideas, for, after the usual "pointing with pride" to its past, he said that "the work of the Republican party is but fairly begun." The succeeding paragraphs, however, do not justify the expectations aroused. There is the conventional dose of meaningless "taffy" for the workingman, but the only two practical suggestions are that "every measure should be supported that will tend to foster, defend, and protect home industries" (which means the same thing as the plea in his Nashville speech for "the tariff laws as they now exist"), and that "the education of the rising generation, without respect to race, color, or previous condition, ought to be a constant object of desire," which, interpreted by the same Nashville speech, means that the Federal Government shall distribute educational subsidies among the States. This kind of talk may suit "young Republicans" of the Pennsylvania stamp, but in the doubtful States, like New York and Connecticut, nothing could do more to turn independent voters, young or old, against the party next year than its adoption of such a platform.

The Tribune of Monday contained a very circumstantial and detailed account of a sad state of things on board the cruiser Atlanta, now lying at the Brooklyn Navy yard. It appeared that nearly everything on board which makes her a fighting ship was botched or out of order, and incapable of being set to rights. There was only one grain of truth in the story, and that was that copper rivets had been found not strong enough to fasten the gun-carriages to the deck. The rest was simply old fashioned journalistic lying. We knew of course that the story would appear very soon in that hardened old sinner, the Boston Journal, with some additions and improvements, and, sure enough, here it is in Monday's issue of that paper. One of the most comic features in it is the corroboration supplied by "an old officer." This is what the fictitious old scoundrel is made to say:

"It all comes of trying to make line officers do mechanical work, which they know nothing about. They have made a list of this business, and I'll bet a brown-stone front against a yard of calico that if the Atlanta is successful in her run up the Sound next week, it will be two months before her guns will be tested."

If he got his due, he would be put in imaginary irons, on imaginary bread and water, and kept there till he put up the imaginary brown-stone front which he bet against the yard of calico. The "old officer," however, is nearly as notorious a liar as the "country clergyman" and "the prominent politician." The minute he opens his journalistic mouth people prepare for "a whopper."

Mr. Vanderbilt's gift of Rosa Bonheur's "Horse Fair" to the Metropolitan Museum, followed so soon by Miss Wolfe's magnificent bequest of the whole of her collection to the same institution, together with a handsome endowment in money, seems, taken in connection with Mr. Tilden's legacy for a library, to indicate that the habit of doing something for the city is at last taking root among the owners of great fortunes. The wealth accumulated in this city since the opening of the canals sixty years ago, by men beginning their business life here, has been something enormous, but, for reasons which we shall not now examine, the city has profited by it but little. Hardly any of it, until very recently, has gone to the local university—Columbia College. We believe this College received its first gift or bequest, and that a small one, within the last ten years. The late Mr. Astor founded a library, which has become a fine one, but it is distinctly a reference or scholars' library. The late Mr. Lenox did the same thing, but his library is still more cloistered than Mr. Astor's. The Metropolitan Museum was started twenty years ago, but in a small way, and has struggled along with difficulty, and is to this hour, considered as the one public art collection of a wealthy metropolis with over a million of popuiation, a melancholy spectacle. The Natural History Museum also owes the most of what it is to private munificence; but what is it to what it ought to be? There has probably never been a fortune made here from which as much was expected, and justly expected, as from that of the late A. T. Stewart. It was literally built up by the plain people of New York, the wives and daughters of men living by wages and salaries. Mr. Stewart, we believe, often expressed his sense of the obligation he was under to this class, and his intention of marking it in some substantial way after his death. But his great fortune has disappeared without leaving, as far as the city is concerned, "a wrack behind." Let us hope that we are now witnessing the dawning of a better day, that the recent splendid examples will be rapidly followed, and that we shall soon be famous for something besides municipal jobbery—for it is a most melancholy fact that New York is better known all over the civilized world for boodle Aldermen and municipal rings than for anything else.

"Consistency" sends us an inquiry which he evidently considers a "corker," namely:

"How is it that the Northern press universally condemned secession, and could hardly find terms strong enough in which to denounce it, now are so generally denouncing the English Government for maintaining the laws of the land in Ireland, and even our Legislature are censuring England for her endeavors to compel obedience to law? Would the United States, the State of New York, submit to anti-rent?"

The reason is, "Consistency," in part that "the laws of the land in Ireland" are considered bad laws, and in part that, whether bad or good, the people who live under them have not only not made them, but have had no part in making them. The thing to do with bad laws is not to enforce, but to repeal or amend them. If Southern laws of the land had been made at the North by Northerners, the Southern rebellion would have had a great deal more sympathy than it had. Moreover, the State of New York did "submit to anti-rent." It tried hard for ten years to get the tenants of the Van Rensselaers and Livingstons to pay their rents, but finally gave it up and left these landlords to settle with their tenants as best they could, which they did by selling their property for whatever the tenants chose to pay. The chances appear to be now that things will run pretty much the same course in Ireland.

Mr. James Bryce, speaking against the Coercion Bill the other day in the House of Commons, remarked that no one who knew nothing of the matter except what he learned from the speeches of the ministers, would suppose for a moment that this was not the first time that a coercion bill had been tried, or that it was actually the eighty-seventh experiment of the kind. Not the slightest allusion was made to the former ones. Another singular feature in the affair is that some of the worst denouncers of coercion in the past, including poor old Mr. Bright, are now backing the Tories up in this latest attempt. Lord Randolph Churchill is among the number, he who only so long ago as February said in a speech:

"I should say that Ireland appears to me at the present moment like a high-spirited and mettlesome horse, which has been extremely badly ridden for some time. There is a certain school of professors of political education—principally represented by the Times newspaper—who apparently imagine that the way to ride a horse of that kind is to be continually jobbing it in the mouth, hitting it over the head with the whip, and digging it in the side with the spur; and that school persist in a passionate admiration of this method, although they have seen rider after rider laid on his back in the ditch."

SUMMARY OF THE WEEK'S NEWS.

[WEDNESDAY, April 6, to TUESDAY, April 12, 1887, inclusive.]

DOMESTIC.

THE American Fisheries Union of Massachusetts recently informed President Cleveland that in their opinion the retaliatory power given him by Congress against Canada would be sufficiently used, if occasion should arise to use it at all, by confining it to the closing of the United States markets to Canadian fish. In reply to this the President wrote, April 7, taking a broader view: "The retaliation contemplated is to be enforced, not to protect solely any particular interest, however meritorious or valuable, but to maintain the national honor, and thus protect all our people." "This measure once resorted to, its effectiveness and value may well depend upon the thoroughness and extent of its application." "This Government and the people of the United States must act as a unit—all intent upon attaining the best result of retaliation upon the basis of maintenance of national honor and duty." "I shall be unflinchingly guided by a sense of what the self-respect and dignity of the nation demand."

The Toronto Globe concludes its comment on the President's letter thus: "This letter, although studiously moderate in tone, intimates plainly what may follow. The position is, to say the least, exceedingly serious."

A Canadian cruiser recently chased a vessel belonging to the United States fishermen out of the three-mile limit, and fired a blank shot at her, off Beaver Harbor.

The President has appointed Benton J. Hall of Iowa to be Commissioner of Patents, vice M. V. Montgomery, resigned; Marshall Park of Norfolk, Va., to be Supervising Inspector of Steam Vessels for the Third District; Eugene Semple of Washington Territory to be Governor of the Territory, and S. O. Shannon of Cheyenne to be Secretary of Wyoming Territory; and Robert E. Pattison of Pennsylvania, E. Ellery Anderson of New York, and David L. Littler of Illinois to be Commissioners to investigate the affairs of the Pacific railroads which have received land grants from the Government, as provided by an act of the last Congress.

The Inter-State Commerce Commission on April 6 issued an order, on application of the Southern Railway and Steamship Association, suspending the enforcement on these roads of the long and short-haul clause of the law for ninety days, subject to modification or revocation. The Commission will sit at Atlanta, Ga., on April 26, at Mobile April 29, at New Orleans on May 2, and at Memphis on May 4, for the consideration of the competition between the water and rail routes. The same period of suspension of the above clause of the law has been allowed to certain roads in the Northwest.

Judge Deady, in the United States Circuit Court of Oregon, rendered an important decision April 9, bearing on the Inter-State Commerce Law. After explaining that the act "does not include or apply to all carriers engaged in inter-State commerce, but only such as use a railway or a railway and water craft under common control or management for a continuous carriage or shipment of property from one State to another," he held that it does not "apply to the carriage of property by rail wholly within the State, although shipped from or destined to a place without the State, so that such place is not in a foreign country." The case concerned the transportation of goods by the Oregon and California Railroad (which lies wholly within Oregon) destined for San Francisco. Besides this decision, which touches the main principle of the new law, there have been two threats made of litigation of a nature that was hardly anticipated. On April 8 a colored man who had bought a first-class ticket was ejected from a first-class car, and subsequently from the train on the Western and Atlanta Railroad, which extends from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Atlanta, Ga. It is reported that suit will be brought for damages under the anti-discrimination provision of the law. The managers of the Chicago and Alton Railroad have threatened to sue the Pennsylvania Railroad Company because the agent of the latter at Logansport, Ind., in a quarrel that has been maintained between Eastern and Western roads about the allowance of commissions on the sale of through-tickets, refused to sell through-tickets over the Chicago and Alton Road, but sold them over a competing line.

In Rhode Island, Democratic State officers and a Democratic majority in the Legislature have been elected. The election law in that State requires that unless a candidate receive a majority over all competitors at the polls, the election shall be decided by the Legislature. All the Democratic candidates for State offices received a plurality, but the candidates for Lieutenant Governor and Secretary of State did not receive a majority. The result is as follows: John W. Davis, Governor, 973 majority; Z. O. Slocum, Attorney-General, 2,518 majority; J. G. Perry, General Treasurer, 2,609 majority; Samuel R. Honey, Lieutenant-Governor, and E. D. McGuiness, Secretary of State, who received pluralities, will be elected by the Legislature. The Senate contains 19 Republicans and 15 Democrats, and the House 28 Republicans and 41 Democrats. The majority against a woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution was 15,123.

The Prohibitionists in Michigan have made charges of fraud at the recent election on the prohibitory amendment. In some of the precincts in Detroit a suspiciously small prohibition vote was returned, and in the new county of Gogebic 2,200 majority against the amendment was returned, although only 1,500 votes in all were cast at the last preceding election in Ontonagon County, out of a part of which Gogebic County has since been formed. It is asserted that men were imported from Wisconsin who voted against the amendment.

Senator Reagan of Texas has declared for prohibition, in opposition to all the other prominent Democrats in Texas, where there is now an exciting campaign, preparatory to the forthcoming submission of a prohibitory amendment to the popular vote.

Gov. Hill of New York on April 12 vetoed the High-License Bill, which fixed the fee to sell spirituous liquors at $1,000 and wine and beer at $100 in this city and Brooklyn. On the same day the Pennsylvania House of Representatives passed a High-License Bill which provides that the license in cities of the first, second, and third class shall be $500, in all other cities $300, in boroughs $150, and in townships $75.

The death penalty has never been prescribed by the law of Michigan. For a time murderers were condemned to solitary confinement, which made most of them hopelessly demented. Subsequently they were imprisoned, but not in solitude. The conclusion seems now to have been reached that these methods have failed, for the lower house of the Legislature, on April 9, passed a bill prescribing capital punishment, by three votes more than the requisite majority.

At a general conference of the Mormon Church at Provo, Utah, April 8, an epistle was read from President Taylor and his advisers, Cannon and Smith, in which Congress, for its legislation against polygamy, is thus spoken of: "In the haste and zeal of madness to destroy Mormonism, all settled principles of jurisprudence are disregarded and evil precedents are established. There is danger that the precedent now being made will in the not distant future be inconceivably fruitful of evil to the people of this republic." The epistle is chiefly remarkable for its silence on the subject of polygamy, to which no allusion whatever was made.

Simultaneously at Kirkland, O., in the temple built by Joseph Smith before the Mormons went to Utah, a conference of non-polygamous Mormons, known as Josephites, was held. They are said to number 20,000. Joseph Smith, a son of the first leader of the sect, made an address wherein he severely condemned polygamy.

The Cherokee Female Seminary near Talequah, I. T., was burned on April 10, and the loss was $250,000. The seminary was intended to accommodate 200 girls.

The old Slave Market, the ancient Cathedral, the Edwards Hotel, the Court-house, and the St. Augustine Hotel at St. Augustine, Fla., were burned April 12. The Cathedral was built in 1793, and was in use for purposes of worship up to the time of its destruction.

A prairie fire from two and a half to seven miles wide swept through Graham and Norton Counties, Kansas, on April 10 and the following days, which burned many cattle and horses and as many as fifteen people. On April 9 a prairie fire threatened to burn the town of Watertown, Dak. The wind was so strong that it blew freight cars from a station at great speed along the track. Another prairie fire two days later near Sioux Falls burned property to the value, it is estimated, of $100,000.

Two distinct shocks of earthquake were felt at Burlington, Vt., April 10. The last was so heavy that many people supposed a great explosion had occurred near by. Doors and windows rattled, and the tops of buildings swayed.

A large proportion of the conductors and brakemen of the Panhandle Railroad, who run between Pittsburgh and Columbus, were arrested April 11 for a series of thefts of goods from the cars. For three years they had stolen merchandise of many sorts, to the value of not less than $500,000. It was a large conspiracy, and places for the disposition of stolen goods had been established in Pittsburgh.

During the first quarter of 1887 1,040 miles of new main railway track were laid on forty-nine different lines in twenty-five of the States and Territories. This is a larger total than has been recorded for any previous year up to the same date, except 1882, when the construction for the entire year reached 11,568 miles.

Mr. S. B. Chittenden of Brooklyn has given Yale College $100,000 for the erection of a new library. The building will be begun at once on a site between the art school and the present library. Mr. George I. Seney of this city has presented a small but valuable collection of pictures to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The Museum, by the will of the late Miss Catherine L. Wolfe, has received the munificent gift of her whole collection, which is one of the best and largest in this city. Besides this, "in order to provide for the better preservation of said paintings and drawings and the future increase of said collection," the will runs, "I give and bequeath to the executors the sum of $200,000 upon trust."

John Wanamaker, the Philadelphia merchant, will introduce the coöperative system into his business by making division of his profits among his employees in addition to their salaries. He estimates that the sum so divided will amount to $100,000 a year.

The three men recently convicted of boycotting the Courier and Journal Publishing Company at New Haven were each fined $50 and costs April 12.

A number of eminent physicians in this city have volunteered their professional services for a proposed hospital for the treatment of diphtheria. There is now no such hospital in the city, and the cases of the disease have increased 60 per cent. within two years.

The verdict in the Andover Theological Seminary trials for heresy has been deferred because time is needed for printing the proceedings, which will fill a large volume.

Mr. Edward Burgess is designing an eighty-six feet sloop yacht for Gen. C. J. Paine, owner of the Mayflower, for the purpose of defending the America's cup in the race next fall against the Scotch cutter Thistle.

The will of the late Francis Palms of Detroit has been declared invalid, wherein he directed that his fortune of $7,000,000 be kept in trust by his children for their children until the last that may be born to them shall have come of age. "If this will were to be sustained and enforced," said the lower State Court, "a vast estate would be tied up and made inalienable for two lives and an indefinite number of minorities, and the absolute power of alienation would be suspended, and this is precisely what the statute has been so careful to forbid"; or, in popular phrase, the law forbids the controlling of fortunes from the grave from generation to generation.

A bronze equestrian statue of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston of the army of the Confederate States was unveiled at New Orleans on April 6, which was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Shiloh, where he fell. An address was delivered by Jefferson Davis.

The young woman was buried at Rahway, N. J., April 10, who fifteen days previously had been found murdered. The facts that she was not identified and that her murderer has not been apprehended, make the case one of the most mysterious in this time of wide and quick publicity of all crimes and of good detective work.

Col. D. Wyatt Aiken, for a long period Representative in Congress from the Third District of South Carolina, died April 6. Commodore Charles Green, United States Navy, retired, died in Providence April 7, in his seventy fourth year. He entered the naval service in 1826, and served continuously until he was retired in 1867. During the civil war, while commanding the Jamestown on blockade duty, he captured six prizes and destroyed the bark Alvarado under the guns at the fort at Fernandina. John T. Raymond, the well-known comedian, whose Colonel Sellers was a classical performance, died of heart disease at Evansville, Ind., April 10. He was born at Buffalo April 5, 1836. Other Americans of note who have died within a week were Samuel Simpson, an uncle of Gen. Grant, for whom he was named; Judge William Strong of Oregon, who was appointed to the Territorial bench by President Fillmore; Gen. James J. Pratt, a politician and prominent citizen of Connecticut; and Eben S. Stearns, President of the Tennessee Normal College and Chancellor of the University of the South.

Lieut. C. V. Morris, a retired officer of the United States Navy, and a grandson of Robert Morris, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, died at Sackett's Harbor, April 11, aged eighty-five years. He entered the navy in 1825, and was in active service during the late war.

Bishop Alfred Lee of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Delaware died at Wilmington April 12, aged eighty years. He was consecrated Bishop of Delaware in 1841, and was the senior bishop of his church in the United States.

FOREIGN.

By way of preparation for the great Easter Monday Hyde Park meeting to protest against coercion, Mr. Gladstone on April 9 wrote a letter to the miners in the north of Great Britain in which he insisted on a large attendance, and said: "In my opinion the rejection of the bill is even more needed by England than by Ireland. For Ireland it is a question of suffering, and she knows how to suffer. For England it is a question of shame and dishonor, and to cast away shame and dishonor is the first business of a great nation."

The crowd which attended the Hyde Park meeting April 11 was estimated to number 150,000 persons. It required an hour and a half for the procession to file into the Park. There were fourteen platforms, from which speeches were made simultaneously. Among the speakers were Lord Mayor Sullivan of Dublin, Messrs. Conybeare and Redmond, members of Parliament, and Michael Davitt. "Don't let the English people believe," said Mr. Sullivan, "those who say the Irish are mortal, implacable enemies of England. That is a falsehood worthy of the bottomless pit. Let there be an end of oppression and injustice and there will be an end of hatred." At the sound of a bugle a resolution condemning the Crimes Bill was put simultaneously at all the platforms, and was carried amid a prolonged roar of cheers. Mrs. Gladstone looked on the procession from a window and was loudly cheered. The Daily News (Liberal) said of the meeting: "The demonstration shows that the bulk of the working population of London have returned to hearty coöperation with the Liberal party, determined to do justice to Ireland. That is the sufficient and ennobling reason for which they gave up their holiday. They refused to take their ease while iniquitous oppression was being done in their name."

Col. King-Harman, Conservative member of Parliament from the Isle of Thanet division of Kent, has been appointed Under Parliamentary Secretary for Ireland—a new office.

Limerick and other Irish ports have been proclaimed under the Peace Preservation Act, prohibiting the importation of arms and ammunition. At Dunmanway, County Cork, a farmer and his wife resisted eviction for eight hours on April 9, hurling stones and other missiles at the police. The attempt to evict them was finally abandoned. A conflict occurred the next day at Belfast between a mob and a body of police, and during the fight one man was wounded.

In consequence of England's treatment of Ireland and the attitude of the Irish clergy on the Irish question, the Pope has charged Cardinal Simeoni, Prefect of the Congregation of the Propaganda, to make a thorough inquiry into the whole matter and to draft instructions for the Irish bishops.

Official notice has been given at Ottawa that during the presence of Lord Lansdowne in the Senate Chamber, at the opening of Parliament on April 14, the galleries of the Senate will be closed. It is thought that he has received threatening letters because of the trouble with the tenants on his Irish estates.

The great permanent infantry barracks at Aldershot, England, were burned April 6.

While the Czar was driving to the Gatchina station in St. Petersburg on April 6, a man and a woman were arrested on the route who carried bombs under a shawl. Another person who tried to present a petition was arrested on suspicion of being an accomplice of these two; and although no actual attempt was made to kill the Czar, the reports received at all the European capitals leave little doubt about the intention of the arrested persons. On the same day the Czar found letters on his writing-table in the Winter Palace threatening him with death.

The Czarina has so suffered from nervous depression since the attempts to kill the Czar that her health is seriously affected.

Lieut. Goreff of the Russian Army has been sentenced to eight years' hard labor in the mines of Siberia for encouraging a revolutionary movement. The Chief of Police at Odessa has organized a body of 400 volunteer detectives to watch suspects.

Four hundred and eighty officers of the Russian Army, it was reported from Odessa April 11, had arrived there to be transported to a convict colony. They are charged with being implicated in the plots against the Czar. They are not Nihilists, but are merely suspected of being in sympathy with the revolutionary party.

It has been announced that the Czar will confer on M. de Giers, the Russian Minister of War, the decoration of the Order of St. Vladimir, with a flattering imperial rescript.

The German police have confiscated many of the books and journals of the Social Democrats, and arrested many persons in Hamburg, Stettin, Königsberg, Mannheim, and other places.

Evidence accumulates of the rigor of the German rule of the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine. The Journal de Genève, which is noted for its impartial treatment of international questions, says that honorable citizens are arrested without apparent cause, dragged through the streets like thieves, and imprisoned during the pleasure of their rulers. The bare fact of having worn or purchased articles of dress whose colors recall the French flag, or of subscribing to a disaffected paper, is considered a crime. The expulsion of Delegate Antoine from Alsace-Lorraine, the tearing up of the imperial flag by Alsatian recruits, and the imprisonment of French sympathizers have caused strong feeling.

An explosion in a nitro-glycerine factory at Freiberg, Saxony, on April 9 killed and injured thirteen persons.

Dr. Windthorst, the German Catholic leader, has informed the Pope that the Centre party will accept the Prussian Ecclesiastical Bill as a filial duty to the head of the Church.

Dr. Lenz, the African traveller, was welcomed on his return to Vienna, April 10. He reported that he was prevented from relieving Emin Bey by the insufficiency of the means at his disposal.

Jean Henri Dupin, the French dramatic author, died April 7, in his ninety-sixth year. While a clerk in a Paris bank he wrote "Le Voyage à Chambord," which proved a success, and thereafter he devoted himself to play-writing. The number of his plays is almost 200. Lieut.-Col. Sir William Owen Lanyon of the British Army died April 6, in this city, of cancer. He served with credit as a staff officer through the Zulu war and both the Sudan campaigns. For the last two years he had been travelling for his health.

The seventieth anniversary of King William of Holland's birthday, which fell on February 19 and was then observed as a holiday by the people of the Hague, was celebrated at Amsterdam on April 12 by general festivity, which was begun by the monarch entering the town in state. The city was gayly decorated and the streets spanned by splendid floral arches.

An expedition sent out by the American Consul at Tangier to break up the infamous usury system in Morocco, has caused the release of all the Moors imprisoned at Alcazar and Larache under American claims, except three who had died. The prisons in which the men were confined were very foul, and the inmates were half starved, ragged, and covered with vermin. Some of them had heavy chains fastened to their necks and legs. A notorious usurer named Tergiman, on whose claims a majority of the people were held in prison, has been arrested and carried to Tangier in irons for trial for falsely claiming to be an American protégé.

Excitement has been caused at Port-au-Prince because of a threat by the British Government to take Tortugas Island for the payment of an old claim by British subjects to the amount of $1,000,000. Fear has been entertained that if the demand were insisted on, the turbulent element in Hayti would take revenge by killing the foreign residents. The French Government has offered to mediate between Great Britain and Hayti, and has ordered a man-of-war to protect foreign residents.

A circular from the Canadian Cardinal Taschereau was read in all the Catholic churches under his jurisdiction April 10, wherein it was announced that the order from Rome forbidding Catholics in Canada to join the Knights of Labor was suspended.

Uneasiness is reported from Rio Janeiro about the health of Dom Pedro.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE IN OPERATION.

FOR some years, women have exercised the right of suffrage in three of the Territories, but the subjection of the Mormon women to the priesthood has rendered the Utah experiment (now ended by the Anti-Mormon Bill passed by the last Congress) utterly valueless for instruction; while the population of Wyoming has been too small to afford any basis for generalization, and the experience of Washington Territory, recently interrupted by a judicial decision that the law of 1883 giving women the ballot is void, through some technical error, has been too brief to warrant conclusions of value to the country at large.

The Kansas Legislature a few weeks ago passed an act giving women the right to vote in municipal elections, and they exercised the right for the first time in the spring elections of last week. As Kansas is a State which has attained an age of more than a quarter of a century, and has a population as large as that of New Jersey, this trial of female suffrage is the most important and significant yet made in the country. The results must command the attention of all thoughtful people, whatever their predilections regarding this issue may be, and we summarize them as compactly as possible.

It must be explained that the word city in Kansas conveys a different meaning from the one to which Eastern people are accustomed, since a few hundred inhabitants there constitute a population large enough for the forms of a municipal government. One must, therefore, not be surprised to hear of exciting contests over Mayor and Aldermen in what hereabouts would be called villages. We first give in the briefest possible form reports from a number of smaller cities, reserving for more detailed description the larger places. We perforce use the figures of the last national census:

Blue Rapids (population 1,299).—Total vote, 357; women, 133. "A pronounced Prohibitionist elected Mayor."

Larned (1,842).—A very exciting contest, resulting in a majority of 48 for Wilson, the temperance candidate for Mayor, nearly all the women voting for him.

Chanute (1,851).—"One hundred and seventy-eight women voted, the majority of them voting a ticket headed 'Temperance Ticket.'"

Columbus (1,993).—Women registered, 189 (about one-half of the whole number); voting, 172. "R. M. Cheshire elected Mayor by 100 majority; no political issue attached to this vote. The votes of the women were divided as to the various candidates."

Hutchinson (2,116).—"Two hundred women voted, and much bad feeling was engendered by their dividing their support and espousing different factions. The ladies' candidate was defeated by 24 majority. The ladies' vote was about evenly divided, both factions of them canvassing the city in buggies."

Garnett (2,144).—"There was a spirited contest, but the Citizens' Temperance ticket, which received the unanimous support of the ladies, was elected by a large majority. Ladies canvassed from house to house and employed carriages to convey their friends to the polls. Two ladies assisted as judge and clerk of election."

Osage Mission (2,266).—Election warmly contested; fifty-nine women voted, all but two after noon. "The sudden rush was occasioned by the fear that the Labor ticket would be elected. Their exertions, however, were without avail, as the Labor candidate for Mayor was elected by 41 plurality."

McPherson (3,267).—"The city election was nonpartisan. The women cast about 200 votes. Over one-fourth of the entire number voting divided among various candidates. They ran a separate ticket, but it did not receive their full vote. The bonds for water-works and high school carried by heavy majorities, the women all voting in their favor. Female suffrage is generally regarded with favor here."

Valley Falls (2,722).—"A prominent third-party Prohibitionist was elected Mayor by votes of women."

Parsons (4,199).—"Dr. G. W. Gabriel was elected Mayor by about 550 majority. Owing to the fact that A. O. Brown was the candidate of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, this is considered a 'crushing blow' to the temperance element. One most deplorable feature of their electioneering to-day was the assailing of Mrs. Gabriel's character by some of the members of the W. C. T. U., when the fact of the matter is, beyond question, that Mrs. Gabriel is one of the most high-minded, respectable, and respected ladies in the city of Parsons, and any insinuations to the contrary are vile slanders."

Emporia (4,631).—"The election was attended with considerable excitement, which was for the greater part caused by the activity of the W. C. T. U. in behalf of their candidate for Mayor, Dr. J. J. Wright, as against N. E. Weaver, the candidate of the Citizens' ticket. Their efforts were not crowned with the most gratifying success, as out of the 542 women who registered, only 398 voted, and of these over one-fourth voted against the candidate of the W. C. T. U. Weaver was elected by a large majority."

Wichita (4,911).—"Two hundred women voted; about half of them were 'sporting' women. Three times that number registered."

Lawrence (8,510).—"The women were out in full force, voting almost their full registration. The colored women's vote of 400 was solid for the Republican ticket, thus deciding the contest. Barker (Rep.) is elected over Whitcomb (Fusionist), by 350 votes. The white women were divided on tickets."

Here are enough of small "cities," only one of them having more than 5,000 people, and half of them less than 2,500. There remain in Kansas three places which might be dignified as cities of the lowest class in the East—Atchison (15,105), Topeka (15,452), and Leavenworth (16,546). At Atchison 336 women registered, one-half colored, and about 280 voted, of whom 200 supported the Democratic candidate for Mayor. "In the Third Ward a colored preacher named Smothers ran for Councilman and drew off colored voters, generally women, enough to defeat the Republican candidate."

In Topeka, the capital of the State, the total registration was 5,494, of whom 1,406 were women, and about 1,200 of them voted. About three-fourths of them supported the Republican candidate for Mayor, and, as he was elected by only a few hundred majority, Democrats concede that the result was decided by the female vote. Some features of the election are thus described:

"The ladies who voted were in general . . . representatives of loyal Kansas womanhood. It had been predicted by the opponents of municipal suffrage that the vote of the degraded and ignorant class of women would overbalance the vote of the respectable ladies; but to-day's election in Topeka proved this not to be true, and a very large majority of the votes cast were by some of the most refined and cultured ladies of the city, and all appeared to vote intelligently and without hesitation. The great portion of the female vote was cast immediately after dinner. . . . The most of the ladies went to the polls with their ballots already prepared, and very often their ballots were scratched."

Leavenworth has more of the characteristics of a large city than any other place in the State, and the canvass there is consequently of unusual interest. There were two tickets—the People's, headed by S. F. Neely, the present Mayor; and the Fusion (Republican and Prohibitionist), headed by Thomas A. Garrigues. Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, an Indiana woman, whose reputation in her old home has, justly or unjustly, been assailed, took command of the female voters. "Particular attention was paid by her to the colored people and the Knights of Labor, and with these elements she was most successful. It is a fact that every nine out of ten colored women voted for Garrigues. They were as much under her leadership and voted her dictation as if they were a body of soldiers." As the campaign waxed warm, Mrs. Gougar grew rather reckless in her language, and made a remark which is said by a reporter to have been that "the best society of the town was frightfully licentious because of the proximity of a military garrison," but which is said by herself to have been that "the upper stratum of society was somewhat licentious." Whatever the exact language, it was enough to arouse the utmost indignation of "the upper stratum," and many women of the leading families resolved to defeat at any cost the candidate whom Mrs. Gougar supported, some of them being still further stirred up by anonymous circulars attacking their personal reputation, which were scattered broadcast over the city. The scenes at the polls are thus described:

"Women, white and black, indiscriminately, stood in front of the precincts and fervently solicited electors to vote the ticket that each one was championing. The ladies were not only enthusiastic for their respective candidates, but they engaged in controversy with each other on the sidewalks. They went into hacks to bring their female friends to the voting places, placed tickets in the hands of their friends, and actually had altercations, which, on other occasions, would, so far as it affects women, be regarded as disreputable. Ladies occupied carriages of all kinds, and ordered them driven hither and thither to pick up all classes of women, irrespective of color or social standing, to cast their ballots for their particular candidates. Their turnouts were decorated with banners and flags indicating their special choice for Mayor, and the polite lady's washerwoman and her hired girl had to vote as the polite lady requested, or a war of words followed."

"The upper stratum" won, Neely being elected by the narrow margin of only forty-six majority; but this is only the first round in the contest, "and from this political fight," it is predicted, "has sprung up a social warfare that will be carried on for years to come."

Reviewing the field, it appears a fair conclusion that in small villages woman suffrage makes no perceptible difference in the result. As the size of the town increases, positive effects begin to manifest themselves from the organization of women—"organized women" sometimes deciding the election, but, as a rule, no more wisely, it would seem, than "organized" voters of any other class. The spectacle of negro women who cannot read their ballots voting at the dictation of a woman politician, is certainly not full of promise. But the most striking and serious feature of the experiment is the precipitation of sexual controversies into municipal elections. This is seen in Parsons, with only about 4,000 people, and reached its culmination in Leavenworth, the chief city of the State.

The government of cities is the great problem of the day. The chief value of the Kansas testimony is for its bearing upon this problem. It must be a hopeful person who can find in these reports arguments in favor of introducing woman suffrage in a State like New York, where one half of the population live in cities larger than Leavenworth.

"GREAT SPEECHES."

ONE of the most striking illustrations of the absence of really exciting questions in the political arena is the decline among us of serious oratory, and the disappearance of "the great speech" from the political literature of the day. It may be safely said that, from the foundation of the Government down to the close of the war, the country never was without one or two orators, and sometimes there were half-a-dozen, who in the course of the year made one or two speeches, on some stirring topic, which were reported and circulated, and eagerly read as "great speeches." No discussion used to be complete until Webster, or Clay, or Calhoun, or Seward, or Sumner, or Trumbull, or Fessenden, or half-a-score of others, had said their say in a long and more or less elaborate oration which the newspapers reported in full, which was read at every fireside in the country, which played a very important part in shaping public opinion, and which supplied quotations and catchwords to the newspapers and minor orators for months afterwards. Moreover, tens of thousands of voters all over the country used to refrain from making up their minds until their favorite orator had been heard from, and the orator himself knew what was expected of him. His failure to produce "the great speech" would have been considered a neglect of the duties of his position, which nothing but ill-health could excuse. His friends in the press, too, prepared for it long in advance by announcing that he was at work on it, and predicting that when it came off it would probably be "the greatest effort of his life," which it generally was. The occasion which imposed the production of the "great speech" on the man in public life also furnished a lecture to the literary man, and the lecture differed from the speech mainly in being rather more elaborate, and in being capable of indefinite repetition. The political orator could not give the speech more than once, but the lecturer carried his all over the country, and the oftener he was asked to reproduce it the more successful it was considered to be.

All this may be said, for a good many years past, to be completely at an end. We have hardly a speaker left in public life whose utterances are looked for with anything but languid curiosity, or are searched for anything but dexterous "bids" for a nomination, or are quoted or discussed, except by opponents as examples of inconsistency or evasion. In fact, it is hardly too sweeping to say that Col. "Bob" Ingersoll is almost the sole representative of the old school of orators and lecturers—that is, the only speaker who draws large houses to hear him on serious topics. Whatever one may think of the topics or of his way of treating them, it must be acknowledged that it would be hard to say to what better place than one of his lectures one could take an inquiring foreigner, who wished to see a specimen of the American platform in the old days before and during the war.

On the other hand, the public dinner has received an enormous development, as a means of letting the public hear from anybody about whom it is supposed to have any curiosity, or who is supposed to have something on his mind which it would like to hear. Its use as "an occasion" has increased wonderfully during the past twenty years. The English used to be the foremost nation in the world in turning it to account, but we have far surpassed them in the frequency with which we resort to it. The French use it now and then, but are more frequently content with the offer of "un punch," which sufficiently furnishes the "to-asts" that draw out the orator. The growth of wealth, the improvement in hotels and restaurants, and the reluctance of busy men to quit their homes in the evening except to dine, have doubtless all contributed to this tendency to substitute the dining-table for the rostrum. But the effect on all our oratory, political as well as other, has been very marked. Nothing can ever prevent a dinner's seeming to the guests a social occasion, or even make them willing, after dinner, to respond to any heavy demands on their powers of reflection or attention. Every man after a good dinner, and still more after a bad one, in his secret heart expects to be amused, or at all events entertained in some light way. He will not follow a train of reasoning, or respond readily to a call for high resolves or noble aspirations. Gentle ridicule pleases him over his cigar and coffee far more than the most lucid exposition or triumphant logical refutation.

This use of the dining-room, too, as an occasion for public speaking has produced in England and America a distinct type of oratory unknown either to the ancients or to the nations of Continental Europe—but known to everybody here as the "after-dinner speech." Now the essentials of an after-dinner speech are that it should be humorous or lively; that it should touch every topic lightly, and should make no heavy or prolonged draughts on any one's sober-mindedness; that it should not be an attempt to edify or instruct. In fact, the more it makes people laugh, the more successful it is. It is accordingly to-day the style of oratory most cultivated among us. Nothing to day gives a man more of a certain kind of fame and popularity than excellence in it. Indeed, we may say that through no channel can a man acquire so much influence with so little expenditure of labor or money. Our young men are to-day really more anxious to acquire it than any other style of oratory. There is far more demand for it than for any other. A man's chances of being called on to speak at a dinner are twenty times greater than his chances of being called on to speak on any other occasion. The style acquired for success in after-dinner oratory is accordingly carried into all oratory. At public meetings, nowadays, every speaker tries to be jocose as his first duty. He opens his speech with a joke more or less elaborate, and a vein of humor is apt to run all through it, the seriousness only appearing at rare intervals. One of the most striking of recent illustrations of this was the meeting called to support the High-License Bill in this city some weeks ago, at which some of our best local speakers appeared. The promoters of the meeting were terribly in earnest, and nothing could well be graver than the subject, which was neither more nor less than the merits of a particular way of attacking an immense mass of vice, crime, and poverty. Nevertheless, every speech began with a joke, and was studded with jokes, and some of the jokes which elicited most laughter were about drunkenness. In fact, it would have been hard for a liquor-dealer to leave the hall without feeling that he was the great mirth-producer of American society, and that even the temperance people recognized the traditional joy-giving quality of good liquor.

The same cause which has introduced so much jocosity into our oratory has also given great prominence to the anecdote or "good story." Formerly, it used to come in occasionally as an illustration, but now many a speech is often a mere string of anecdotes. This is a fresh proof of the scarcity of serious subjects in the political arena. It may be taken as a general rule of conversation that the fewer subjects a man can talk about, the more stories he tells. In primitive states of society and in remote communities social intercourse consists almost entirely in the interchange of very long stories, told in a dramatic manner, with mimicry. In many parts of the Southwestern and Southern States to-day, these stories take the place of conversation at social gatherings almost completely, and the best raconteur literally "rules the roast." As population becomes more dense, and acquaintance with men and books increases, and topics multiply, the stories are shortened up into anecdotes, and any attempt to draw them out is viewed with disfavor, and finally punished as a bore. In the modern society of great capitals, stories are now only permitted in the shortest, crispest, and most epigrammatic form. The "point" has to be produced almost immediately, before any one has had time to foresee it or to lose patience in waiting for it. A man who contributes nothing but stories to the talk of clever men and women is suspected, and often justly, of having nothing else to contribute. It is, perhaps, partly in consequence of this social ostracism that the story is taking refuge so largely in public speeches. But it is undoubtedly due in a still larger degree to the absence of topics fitted to draw the old thunder from the oratorical sky. If we said, also, that the increased scrappiness and gossipiness of the newspaper press were making serious moods more difficult for the general public, we should probably cause journalistic irritation, which we should be the first to deplore.

AFTER THE IRONSIDES ON A TRICYCLE.

—I.

I HAD been working in London many weeks in the great heap of seventeenth-century documents at the British Museum, and among the old manuscripts in the Public Record Office at Fetter Lane. I had been tracking the career of that noble boy-Governor of colonial Massachusetts, young Harry Vane, who, returning home, strove through the Civil War, until he laid his head upon the block at last, that government of the people, by the people, and for the people might not perish from the earth. As I had followed the Ironsides in the musty papers, I had grown tired of the dust and mildew. On the occasion of a heavy sneeze in the Search-room of the Record Office—a premonition, perhaps, of asthma (I am a convert to the old belief that a sneeze opens a passage for outer spirits, good and evil, to enter a man)—the thought suddenly shaped itself within me, "Why should I not go after the Ironsides on a tricycle?" I acted upon the idea at once.

King Charles I. set up his standard in Nottingham, August 23, 1642, beginning the Civil War. The Earl of Essex, going the seventy miles from London to Northampton, there took command of the 20,000 Parliamentary levies, and marched after him. On the 24th August afterwards I followed on the track of Essex to Northampton, to-day a most prosaic shoe-town, sending to Parliament Bradlaugh. I bowled over the hills of the midland counties, now an easy bit of pedalling along a far-extending level, now a dismount and a push up a height, now a breathless rush from the upland into the vale, with the feet braced and hand hard on the brake.

It was lovely weather and a lovely land. I followed the Avon as it flowed winding from its source in a series of pretty transformations. It ran first, a little thread, from its high-lying spring. It looped off through the landscape out of sight, to appear again, close by Lutterworth, Wickliffe's old parish, as a gay ribbon—the scarlet poppies, the daisies, the purple ragged-robins, the blue larkspurs throwing in their reflections from the margin until the silvery band was edged with brilliant color. At length, as I lay on the churchyard grass behind the church of Stratford—for those few evening moments nearer to Shakspere's dust than any other mortal—the river had become a Roman scarf, banded and shot through with the tints of the sunset.

Southward from Stratford at length, I saw rising before me the high outlying spur of the Cotswolds, Edgehill, reaching the breezy summit of which, I had at my feet the fairest prospect of the English Midlands. Blue to the west was the Great Malvern, by Worcester; nearer at hand, the wolds of Gloucestershire; Oxfordshire was close by; and the fine rolling country of Northamptonshire, Leicestershire, and Warwickshire, out of which I had just come, lay east and north—all spread, that August noon, in perfect summer beauty, under bright sunshine, the verdure brilliant from lately fallen rain, bits of forest dark on vivid grass, the gray of church-towers, the yellow of freshly-built wheat-stacks, a patch of deep red now and then where the soil lay bare. The stretch of plain just below me claimed my especial notice, dignified as it had been by a great event: there it was that Essex, advancing from Warwick, and Charles, descending the steep slope of Edgehill from the brow on which I stood, clashed together.

It was a drawn action, and, with a glance at an interesting figure who played a part there, I must pass on to a greater and more decisive field. In Warwick Castle, the day before I was at Edgehill, I saw one of the most attractive of the portraits of Vandyke—a handsome youth, scarcely more than twenty, in a corselet over a coat of buff leather, beautiful brown hair falling over the broad linen collar, the cheek smooth, the eyes bright with manly, martial energy. It is Prince Rupert, close upon the time when he was to become famous. I had known well in Heidelberg Castle, the nook where he was born, a hawk's nest high above the Neckar; and the hawk is no inapt symbol of this man, whose life was involved in the wildest storms, whose glance was like lightning, whose swoop towards his prey was resistless, whose heart was rapacious and merciless. In all the thousand figures that become prominent in this time of struggle, there is none so picturesque as this young prince, so haughty and cruel, so swift and beautiful. If to his courage and persistence could have been united good judgment, he might have been one of the greatest of soldiers. In the landscape of his time his fame is as the flash of a sword-blade, the waving of a brilliantly dyed scarf; it catches the eye for a moment, but is utterly unsubstantial.

For the Parliament, things went from bad to worse. Whoever studies the story—it has never been given so thoroughly and accurately as by Samuel Rawson Gardiner in his great history of this time, just published—must feel that the saving of the cause of freedom at this juncture was due especially to that most American of Englishmen, young Sir Henry Vane. With Pym and Hampden both dead, he succeeded to their leadership. He was not a soldier, but fought in the midst of dangers and hardships scarcely less upon the floor of Parliament. To him it was mainly due that Parliament did not supinely succumb to the King, leaving the grievances unredressed, that stern discipline brought harmony out of insubordination and divided counsels, that an alliance with Scotland was at last made which brought 20,000 hardy soldiers to the support of the failing cause.

I reached York at the end of a summer afternoon, passing in under the ancient wall which girds the town, still substantially as it was left by the engineers of Charles. It is of gray stone, buttressed and battlemented; the ancient gates, intact, bear the same escutcheons and inscriptions as when they barred out the Parliament. I did not linger, but was soon following the old Marston road, along which, July 2, 1644, the Parliamentary army withdrew from the siege of York, with Rupert in their rear. Westward, within a mile or so, I soon saw a heavy growth of forest, between which and the road lay a broad marshy plain, broken by hedges. The plain also extended southward, ending at the distance of half a league in a long low ridge—grass land it was, while on the ridge the harvests just reaped were stacked high. These were all noteworthy localities. The forest was Wilstrup Wood, of which there will be presently mention; the ridge was the ground upon which the men of the Parliament turned at bay; the marshy plain was Marston Moor—the entire landscape little changed since the battle-day, except that what was then open moor land is now an enclosed and cultivated tract. In Long Marston, a straggling village of thatched cottages along a winding street, I found an old farmer, of a stock which, father and son, had been upon the spot since the battle day. Between six and seven o'clock, the sun still bright, the very hour when the battle began, I rode with the farmer in a two-wheeled cart without springs down a track which led into the centre of Marston Moor, and studied the field from the point where the fight was most desperate.

How did the foemen stand in this battle, all things considered, the greatest which has taken place on English soil since Hastings? Each host was about 25,000 strong. For the Parliament the chief command was in the hands of an old soldier of Gustavus, the Scotch Earl of Leven, but his fire was burnt out, and it would have gone hard with the Parliament had there not been better soldiers there than he. Sir Thomas Fairfax had covered the rear, as the allies withdrew, as brave and skilful a chief as ever led Englishmen; and as he began at Marston to feel the breath of Rupert's sharp pursuit, he sent hot alarm to the advance, posting himself at the same time in the village. He had some seasoned troops, but many were raw recruits. Next to Fairfax, the line running west along the ridge, Leven, who hurried back, placed his centre, or main "battle," tough Scotch infantry, sternest Covenanters, massed in solid squares, the pikemen in the centre, the musketeers on either flank—a superannuated arrangement, to which the military pedant adhered. The Lords who were in chief command that day were generally inexperienced, but their subordinates were often veterans from the Thirty Years' War, schooled, sometimes demoralized and steeled, to all forms of ruthlessness in desperate scenes of carnage and license. Among these Dugald Dalgettys the best soldier was David Leslie. The world has not often seen stouter men than were the Scots that day, but some of them were destined to gain little credit, rather perhaps through the force of circumstances than any failure of their own. West of the centre came the English infantry of the Earl of Manchester, flanked by cavalry, like the wing of Fairfax. The line ended at the village of Tockwith, with the Scotch troopers of David Leslie, between whom and the infantry sat on powerful chargers a body of about 2,300 men, conspicuous at a glance from out the entire host as in every way perfectly appointed and disciplined. Notice these men well, far out on the left wing there, the afternoon sun flashing upon the bridle-hand as they steadily range themselves.

A young Cavalier dandy of 1640 has left behind him a description of a man he saw at the opening of the Long Parliament, "very ordinarily apparelled, in a plain cloth suit made by an ill country tailor, his linen not very clean, his hat without a band, his stature of good size, his sword stuck close to his side, his countenance swollen and reddish, his voice sharp and untunable, and his eloquence full of fervor. I sincerely profess, it lessened much my reverence unto that Great Council, for the gentleman was very much hearkened unto." This rude-looking country squire has since then had some reputation in the field. He was in the mêlée at Edgehill, but little noticed on that day. A significant remark, however, which he made to his cousin, Hampden, was afterwards recalled. It was to this effect, that if Rupert were to be successfully met, it must be by troopers of better stuff than tapsters and worn-out serving-men. The Cavalier vigor must have set against it breasts inspired by the spirit of God. Forthwith he set to work to constitute such a body of troopers, and this night on Marston Moor, he and they are to win their first great fame—men equally good at prayer, at sermon, and at sabre. So the 25,000 stood ranged, their artillery in front, a mile and a-half along the ridge between Marston and Tockwith, Oliver Cromwell and his men far over on the left wing. At Warwick Castle you are shown the steel cap that covered his head as he galloped and smote and shouted his Old-Testament war-cries where the danger was thickest. As the Parliament men took position, they trampled down the tall grain just ready for harvest. Now and then a dash of summer rain incommoded them. As Covenanter and Puritan sang their battle-hymns low thunder was heard in the pauses.

As there was division in the host of the Parliament, Scot and Englishman not coalescing with entire cordiality, so, among the Cavaliers, Rupert had been supercilious, and his subordinates were sullen. There was delay in forming, but at length on the Moor, opposite the embattled ridge, an answering array was placed. The foemen faced each other across a narrow interval, separated, however, by a deep drain, known as the White Syke Ditch. There was little difference in dress or armor; the Parliament men wore, therefore, in their hats a white badge. Rupert's standard of silk, emblazoned with the arms of the Palatinate, and with a cross of red, waved over his life-guard. After heavy cannonading, the battle began at seven, the two lines, equally eager, moving forward to the ditch throughout their lengths. Fairfax at the right had a difficult task, being forced to proceed through bad ground by a narrow obstructed lane. His column was struck by the Cavaliers with all possible fury and completely crushed. The centre, too, was nearly broken, multitudes of Scots, among them the Earl of Leven himself, taking to flight. The Cavaliers thought the battle gained, and parties of them fell to plundering the baggage on the ridge—for them a sorrowful mistake.

The sun of the long summer day was now near its setting, the level light tinging the war cloud above the cumbered field. The day was lost for the Parliament on the side of Marston, but at the west the fortune had been different. While the infantry of Manchester had boldly come to push of pike, the horse of Cromwell, minding as little the volleys of the musketeers from the White Syke as they had the rain of the afternoon, spurred forward. Rupert at the moment was at supper with many of his troopers, but all were in the saddle in an instant, under the folds of the great banner. His own charge was as prompt as that of the Puritans, and the thousands of galloping horses and brandished swords met like nothing so much as two opposed oceans. Let fancy picture the horses overthrown, writhing and rolling upon their riders, the shouted war cries, the curse from the lips of the Cavalier, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon" from the Roundhead, while lance and sabre rang upon headpiece and corselet! At one moment all seemed lost for the Parliament. Cromwell, wounded in the neck, was for an instant stunned, and the Roundheads recoiled. David Leslie, however, drove in like lightning with his Covenanters upon the Cavalier flank. Cromwell, dashing the stupor from his senses, was again at the front. The steeds of the Cavaliers were beaten back upon their haunches; their line was forced through and through; at last a great swarm of entreating and bewildered riders fled rearward to where the twilight was beginning to gather in the heavy Wilstrup Wood.

It is said that here Cromwell and Leslie paused for a moment in the pursuit, and that just then a small group of panting men, in broken armor, on steeds well-nigh spent, suddenly appeared to the victors. All had plainly but just emerged from a life-and-death struggle, and their leader, scarcely recognizable on account of a streaming sabre cut on his face, declared himself to be Fairfax. From his conquered wing he had burst his way through his pursuers, bringing through the battle smoke the first news of his defeat. The points of Oliver were once more advanced. The troopers, not less perfect in discipline than ardent in courage, obeyed his shout, and went back once more to the White Syke, close at hand to the hard-pressed Parliamentary centre, "both sides not a little surprised that they must fight it over again, when each thought victory gained." In the shadows the strife became more than ever close and desperate, but the Puritan prevailed. The "White Coats," the flower of the Cavalier infantry, stood alone at length, within the "White Syke Close," a space on the moor ditched in and difficult of access. Here, disdaining to flee, and refusing quarter, to a man they died in their ranks as they had stood. Day faded, and the moon lighted the awful battle upon which at last a solemn hush descended. Faint and far, however, from the gloom of Wilstrup Wood and from the road, comes a sound of galloping horse, of the stroke of the sword upon armor, of voices raised in pleading. The Roundheads, tireless, implacable, through the night pursue the fugitives to the gates of York. Nearly one-quarter of the Cavaliers fell upon the field and in the pursuit. Thus the mighty Oliver bore Rupert to the earth, and Rupert it was who then and there gave him and his troops the name of "Ironsides."

So at seven o'clock of the summer evening, the hour when the battle was joined, I rode towards the moor in the two-wheeled cart with the old farmer for a guide. On the ridge to the rear a clump of trees marked the headquarters of Leven, behind the Parliamentary line. We passed now the station of Fairfax, the farmer telling me of seeing skeletons disinterred, and how fine and sound the teeth were, evidently men young and in their full strength. We turned from the highroad into that lane that led into the moor, down which Fairfax had charged. The weather had been dry, but the ground was still so marshy that the hoofs of the heavy farm horse slumped in the black mire, and we jarred unsteadily on, as now one wheel and now the other sank into a rut. From a quarter to half a mile of such progress, then, turning to the left, we were presently on the brink of a deep ditch, the White Syke itself, and in the centre of the field. Here Fairfax was met as he debouched upon the moor, and dashed into ruin; and here, too, the Ironsides, after their stubborn breasting of Rupert's spears, charged home upon the backs of the Cavaliers, at the very moment when with their pikes they were thrusting into rout the Scots of Leven. Here, said the old man, indicating with his hand a strip of field before us, many skeletons have been ploughed up, cannon balls, too, and often bullets, the lead covered with a white rust from the long burial. It was the place where the "White Coats" had died in their ranks. I looked across to where the spire of Tockwith rose among the trees at the distance of a mile. Smooth acres lay between, which imagination peopled with a fierce confusion of clanging troopers, long-locked gallants under a red cross swooping after the handsome Prince in his cloak of scarlet: thundering against them, the Roundhead inundation whose crest was of pitiless steel! All lay in the quietest peace. The deepening evening lent solemnity to the fields and to the shadows of Wilstrup Wood close by, the trees of which bore long in their hearts the Parliamentarian bullets. At the bottom of the White Syke, still good cover for resolute infantry, and a dangerous obstacle to horse, ran a sullen black stream. I climbed over it as an old musketeer might have done, while the last load of hay for the day was going home from the field where the "White Coats" lay buried. I dismissed the cart and the old man as the twilight grew deep, crossing the fields alone from which had advanced Rupert's left. If his right had advanced at Marston Moor to such good purpose, Charles I. would have regained his throne.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE JUBILEE COERCION BILL.

DUBLIN, April 2, 1887.

DURING the winter there was little new to say regarding general politics in Ireland. They went their usual way, and anything that to young persons or to those freshly awakened to the Irish question appeared novel, was only natural development of previous events, or what has been the normal condition of the country for the past half-century. The Plan of Campaign was indeed original in some of its conceptions; it was, however, but a closer consolidation of that system of combination among the tenantry through which the Land League achieved its earlier triumphs. In its main features, and as worked under the approval of its sponsors, Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Brien, the Plan has on the whole been justified by events. There were several of the large landed proprietors whom nothing could bring to reason, who had in them no bowels of compassion; and if the only screw possible has been turned upon them, we must not be too ready to condemn it as an infraction of the moral law simply because we are not accustomed to outraged humanity using that defensive weapon. Justification of the refusal to meet theoretical contracts no doubt tends to throw all society into confusion—to relax the obligations which consolidate it. But already every moral idea regarding land-holding in Ireland has been confused for generations by external law, supported by irresistible material force, sustaining the landowners in gradually confiscating the improvements of the tenants and their labor beyond a mere living—a mere living even in the best of seasons. It may also be remembered that numerous British members of Parliament and others, having during the past few months traversed this country from north to south and east to west, and interviewed representatives of all parties, religions, and politics, have returned to England to advocate the tenants' side of the question. The stand which the Pall Mall Gazette now makes is entirely due to the conscientious and thorough investigations of Mr. Stead, who, I know, came over by no means disposed to take the tenants' side of the question to the extent he has since done.

The Government has hitherto been relying upon what it has been pleased to style the "ordinary law." It is an "ordinary law" which to English-speaking peoples must appear very extraordinary. Under it the Habeas Corpus Act was in some respects practically suspended, and the power of arbitrary imprisonment revived by the simple expedient of Government moving the Queen's Bench and the minor courts, by virtue of obsolete powers and acts of Parliament, to make obnoxious persons give bail for good behavior or go to jail. It was accomplished in other cases by refusing to admit to bail prisoners charged with bailable offences. The Crown resorted to laws and methods of procedure which have fallen into disuse in Great Britain, and the revival of which in practice would not be there tolerated. In several cases trials were postponed from assizes to assizes, and the prisoner was finally discharged without trial; and again, in the words of the Pall Mall Gazette: "The Government withdrew the charge of felony, on the strength of which they had secured the refusal of bail, and proceeded on other counts of a less serious nature which deprived the prisoner of the right of challenging more than six jurors, while the Crown had the right of ordering any number to stand aside."

Jury-packing has been shamelessly practised. Take the case of the Woodford trials at Sligo. In that town there are nine Catholics to one Protestant. The jury panel, prepared by a Tory landlord high sheriff, a Tory land agent subsheriff, and a Tory clerk of the Crown, resulted in a panel of 128 Protestants and 122 Catholics. Then there were six juries, in the striking of which the Crown, by its unlimited challenge, marked off ninety-six names, while the prisoners could object to only thirty-six, and as a net result two juries were constituted entirely of Protestants, and three others with nine, ten, and eleven Protestants on them respectively. Under the "ordinary law" the Government has in many ways dispensed with all law, acted with impunity in violation of law, and made laws for itself. We had the Attorney-General writing in relation to the Plan of Campaign, "I do not see how any action can be taken by the Executive." Then, after some weeks, we had the Plan proclaimed an illegal conspiracy by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and Sir M. H. Beach. Then came an abortive trial to test its legality. Meetings were suppressed by force in several parts of the country simply on the motion of the Government.

To illegality has been added the strangest blundering, and the worst blunder of all has been the arrest and imprisonment of Father Keller and Father Ryan for refusing to give evidence before the courts in the matter of persons made bankrupts through having adopted the Plan of Campaign. In a normal state of society there would be no grounds for their refusal, but, as affairs stand in Ireland, their refusal was inevitable; their evidence could readily have been dispensed with; and for Judge Boyd to have brought the Government into full conflict in this matter with the people and clergy, backed up personally by the Archbishops of Cashel and Dublin, is a singular proof of how entirely the governing classes here are ignorant of the feelings and prejudices of the mass of the people. Much that goes on in Ireland now resembles scenes from an opéra bouffe. Father Keller and Father Ryan, under arrest, insisted on travelling to Dublin by slow trains, so as to receive the demonstrations of the populace, ecclesiastics, and town councils on the way. The Archbishop of Dublin and the Lord Mayor with their carriages attended them to prison. The authorities insisted that the prisoners themselves should go in cabs. This they did, attended by enormous crowds of the populace, who took the horse from under Father Keller's cab and drew it themselves to prison, and, a few days afterwards, wanted to lynch the cabman who drove Father Ryan to the same place.

The present Government, like their predecessors, Liberal or Conservative, came into office pledged to grant no self-government to Ireland, but to pacify her by immediate and sweeping reforms and by the removal of all grievances. Our present rulers have been eight months in office and have done nothing. It would appear easy for a powerful and determined Administration to carry out the above policy. But it has not been done, and, judging by similar experiments in the past, we must infer that, in Ireland's case, effectual and beneficial reform is impossible upon lines repugnant to the vast majority of the people. And we now have, in the eighty-seventh year of so-called Union and in the fiftieth year of the Queen's reign, which we are asked to celebrate, a Coercion Bill more hateful to the mass of the Irish people than any former one—introduced upon slighter grounds, more inefficient for the desired purposes, and more subversive of all ideas of liberty and political growth. What has to be combated and overcome here is want of confidence in law—heartfelt detestation of it, unless when it affects the narrowest personal interests. Mr. Gladstone has completely exposed the flimsiness of the statistics upon which is based the supposed necessity for the measure. Some of Mr. Balfour's own figures are most striking. Among 755 cases of personal injury through moonlighting and the like, in 422 cases the injured parties have themselves refused to aid in the detection of the criminals. A Coercion Act such as that proposed would doubtless lead to the conviction and punishment of many persons who without it would go free. But, administered, as it would be, by partisan paid magistrates, depending on the Castle, it would inevitably lead to the perpetration of much direct injustice, and confirm the conviction of the people that the law was a power apart from and against them. Mr. Balfour is, I believe, the ninth Chief Secretary who within the past seven years has taken upon himself the task of "governing" this country—we have had six Lord-Lieutenants and four Under-Secretaries in the same period.

The attitude of Mr. Chamberlain and his friends, the "Coercionist Radicals," as Mr. Morley calls them, is not surprising. Home rule, from being the harmless craze of a few Irish fanatics and the powerless mass of the Irish people, has become the serious conviction of men like Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley. The real contest has begun. We are face to face with the honest belief of the Cavour party in England, that party of which the able and weighty Spectator is the exponent, that reform may with safety be granted to Ireland, but never the right of administering her own internal affairs. And if I have correctly gauged the strength and depth of conviction of that party, the struggle will be long and severe; the futility of a system of coercion even stronger, perhaps, than that now proposed by Mr. Balfour may have to be proved before we, or those that come after us, see the end of this miserable and, to both parties, debasing conflict.

In one direction, however, there is certain light and hope. The difficulty in past years was that there was no common ground of sympathy upon which the countries could unite—no common ground for honorable compromise and union. We have that now in the person and character and action of Mr. Gladstone. To men like Mr. Morley and Lord Spencer, honor is due for the fearless manner in which they have enunciated the opinions regarding home rule into which the logic of events has forced them; but to few men has been given in their old age the clearness and freshness of vision of Mr. Gladstone—so above all predilections and interests, so entirely forgetful of much that we have done and said against him. When he has come so far to meet us, there can be no dishonor in our going a long way to meet him. And this influence is working a slow but sure revolution in the feelings of the masses of our people towards friendship with England, and in the direction of loyally accepting any settlement which he in conjunction with Mr. Parnell would recommend. Mr. Gladstone's removal from public life might delay, but it could not now prevent, the ultimate consummation of the task to which he has so unflinchingly and resolutely devoted himself. Mr. Chamberlain and his friends may be, and doubtless are, holding out for his retirement. But whenever (unfortunately) it comes, they will find that they have been mistaken—that the good results and the consummation of his policy do not depend on the life of any one man or set of men.

THE MORAL RESPECTABILITY OF POLITICAL PARTIES.

LONDON, March 26, 1887.

"THE first Liberal," some zealous Tory has said, "was the devil." The dictum, we may suppose, was delivered at about the same period when Sir Walter Scott undoubtedly expressed a fear lest the sound principles of the young Duke of Buccleuch should be injured by attending the lectures of that most respectable of Whigs, Mr. Smythe, Professor of History at Cambridge. "Why do people become Tories?" asked a child of his mother, a sound Whig. "Because, my dear, they are born bad, and make themselves worse." An eminent Republican, we are told in England, summed up the character of parties in the United States in the remark: "I don't say that all Democrats are horse-stealers, but I do say that all horse-stealers are Democrats." A man of good memory might easily collect scores of sayings like those I have cited, and a man who did collect them would, it is probable, cite them as proofs of the unfairness produced by party spirit. Nor is this way of drawing a lesson from the language in which Tories speak of Whigs, or Whigs speak of Tories, illegitimate. The vices of party spirit are notorious; and if any one thinks it worth while to try whether he can cure the faults of human nature by the free application of moral platitudes, he has a full right to do so.

Let me, however, at once say that nothing is further from my wish than to turn the Nation into a pulpit whence to deliver sermons on the odiousness of faction. The texts of my discourse, if so I may call it, are cited for another object. They express the feeling of strong partisans that, at a given moment, the moral worth, the "respectability" (if one may use in its right sense a much-abused term) of the country is in the main enlisted in favor of the party to which the speaker belongs. This, it may be said, is a natural prejudice. So be it. What, however, is to be noticed is that, in England at least (and I should suppose also in America), this so-called prejudice has, as a matter of history, been constantly justified by fact. Respectability, moral worth—what Matthew Arnold means, I suppose, by conduct—has at different periods been enlisted on the side now of what we may vaguely call Liberalism, and now of what we may equally vaguely call Conservatism or Toryism. There really has been, as every historian will admit, a respectable party, opposed to a party who were in the main the less respectable, not to say the disreputable, party.

This opposition is traceable nowhere more clearly than in the contest of which it may be said, with most truth, that the best men in the nation were to be found ranged against each other. It hardly needs the morbid impartiality of Mr. Gardiner to convince candid readers that Roundheads and Cavaliers were not divided from one another by the line which separates good from bad. A student must be prejudiced indeed who can suppose that all the virtue of the English people was, during the Civil War, resident either at Oxford or at Westminster. Pym, Hampden, Cromwell, and Baxter, on the one side, Laud, Hyde, Falkland, on the other, may at the present day be regarded by all competent judges with a calmness and with a sympathy impossible to writers even of the last generation. But to recognize that in a crisis of immense, and to the men of the seventeenth century of strictly unprecedented, difficulty, persons equally wise and equally good were impelled by duty and by judgment to follow opposite paths, is quite a different thing from believing that one path was as well chosen as the other, or that, on the whole, and speaking (as is necessary in such matters) very much in the rough, the moral sense of the country did not incline more towards one course than the other. Take it all in all, the good sense and the morality of England went with the Parliament against Charles. The dictum of the American Republican in principle exactly hits the case. It were folly to say that all or many of the Cavaliers were rakes or blackguards, but the rakes, blackguards, or adventurers tended to support the Court. Baxter at Kidderminster found that the drunkards were generally Loyalists. "The pure Royalism of the Restoration," writes Mr. Gardiner, "appeared in Waller in all its native offensiveness." The very vices of the Parliamentary party are in some sense a proof of its virtues. Religious cant is profitable to hypocrites only among associates who have a genuine care for religion. Though there were good men and saintly men among the followers of Charles, the respectability of the nation was, up to 1649, with the Parliament. The Restoration, again, was something more than the mere heyday of moral license and courtly servility. Admiration of Puritan virtue must not hide from us the fact that the best men of England and Scotland welcomed the restoration of the monarchy. Nor, if Charles II. had been anything like the ruler whom the best Presbyterians no less than the best Episcopalians hoped for, is it at all impossible that the restoration of the King might have founded a form of monarchy based on law and liberty.

The license of Charles II. and the bigotry of James II. threw the moral weight of the nation on to the side of the Whigs. When any one reflects on the disadvantages entailed by law and sentiment on dissent, no one can doubt that at the end of the seventeenth century the English Dissenters represented much of the solid worth which made up the character of the nation, and for a century at least the Dissenters were with the Whigs. To put the matter in the most general terms, the Whigs were, from the Revolution of 1689 till very near the middle of George III.'s real reign, the respectable party. But—and this is a point which needs careful attention—the Whigs of 1760 were in many points what we should term conservative in spirit. Add to this that, even before they were attacked by George III., the moral supremacy of the Whigs was on the wane.

Take, now, another long period of fifty years or so—say from 1780 to nearly 1832. Can any fair Liberal really doubt that, from causes which are easily traceable (as, for instance, the moral reaction caused by French infidelity and by French Jacobinism), the respectability of the country was in the main with the Tories? If any one looks either at the general set of public opinion or at the equally instructive streamlets—if so you may call them—of biographical experience, he will acknowledge that the statement I have made, taken with all the numerous reservations to which all generalizations about human affairs are subject, is in the strictest sense true, and, if anything, rather within the truth. Among the English people on either side the Atlantic, religious feeling has been at all times the best index to the real and effective beliefs of the day. Now, the period I have mentioned was a time of religious revival, and Puritanism has shown—though foreign Liberals find it almost impossible to recognize this fact—that religious fervor has no essential connection with monarchical or reactionary sympathies. Through the whole of this period, nevertheless, the religious parties of the day supported the Tories. This connection, moreover, between religion and Toryism was not connected with indifference on the part of religious men to reforms which they believed to be for the benefit of the people. Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Wilberforce's friends were the leading philanthropists of the time, yet as a body they were followers of Pitt and of Pitt's successors. The secret of the adherence on the part of good and philanthropic men to the Tories is well enough expressed in a speech delivered by Macaulay in his early and very transitory phase of boyish Toryism. He brought down the cheers of the Cambridge Union by a eulogy of the "good old King." The good old King, with all his dulness and cunning, was the type to the English people of moral and patriotic respectability. His virtues were set off to perfection by the vices of the Prince; and the Prince, be it remembered, was the favorite and patron of the Whigs. If any one wants to know why the exalted genius of Burke never exercised half the weight with the nation which was its due, he can do nothing better than study the account of the relation between the Prince and the Whigs given in the memoirs of Lord Minto.

Lord Grey, Lord Althorpe, and Lord John Russell gave new life to the Whigs, not by importing into the party genius or insight, but by renewing their good character. And when Liberalism became, in 1832, the predominant creed of the country, the Liberals were (politically at least) as respectable a party as opponents who had for years borne the odium and reaped the advantage of Tory jobs. Croker and Lord Lyndhurst were good partisan leaders, but were not persons to carry weight with the English public. The struggle between Peel and his opponents was mainly a struggle for political character, and in the contest Peel on the whole gained the advantage. The fall of the great Conservative Minister placed the Tories under the guidance of a leader who, whatever his merits, never rid himself or his party from the discredit of the mode in which he obtained the leadership, and the moral recklessness with which he fought for power. It is the fashion to extol Lord Beaconsfield as a great party leader. His great gifts as a Parliamentary combatant cannot be denied. But to his followers his leadership was fatal. To the English public the Conservatives became a faction led on adventures by a clever adventurer. Whether this opinion was sound or not is, for my present purpose, of no great consequence. What I urge on my readers' attention is, that the Liberals were intellectually and politically for many years the respectable party. They were the party of sound political doctrine and of admitted public spirit. A dull, well-meaning country gentleman, who sympathized with ordinary, even commonplace, English modes of thought and English ideas of political morality, would, on more occasions than one, have led the Conservatives to successes unattainable by all Mr. Disraeli's talent and audacity.

For here we come across another and, in the eyes of a careful observer, a most important point in the political history of England. Respectability has in the long run always commanded success. The respectable party has been the victorious party. In each one of the instances to which I have referred, this will be found to have been the case. The English public have, in the past at any rate, proved themselves good judges of character, whether in politics or in private life; they have proved themselves very inferior judges of policy or of statesmanship. If we take as a test of this the judgment of English electors at the end of the last or at the beginning of the present century, we shall see clearly that this was so. The public judgment was sound enough as to the demerits of Fox and Fox's followers; and the public were sagacious enough in keeping in power ministers whose general tone and character approved itself to the moral judgment of the day. If any one should attempt to read the Life of Mr. Percival he will find the task, to judge by my own experience, one of the dreariest that mortal man ever undertook. But the student will be rewarded by understanding better than he ever did before with what instinctive sagacity Englishmen pick out for honor the kind of moral respectability which they appreciate. If we want to see how ill a public opinion, which could judge well enough of character, could appreciate questions of policy, we have nothing to do but to read the common sense of Sydney Smith, and remember that the most sensible of English political writers was for many years occupied in the vain attempt to persuade Englishmen that the dictates of good sense ought not to be regarded as doctrines fit only for knaves or fanatics. The Edinburgh Reviewers, strange as the fact appears to us now, were by the majority of Englishmen held to be tainted with Jacobinism. The Whigs were in disrepute, and until Liberalism became respectable "the Whigs' not getting into place" was, as we learn from Byron, the one unchangeable fact in the changing world of politics. Nor, by the way, was his Lordship's own fame at all helpful to the success of his friends.

Combine the two facts that, looking at the past in a very general way, as one must do in matters of this kind, a student finds that there has constantly been in England a respectable party, at one time Conservative and at another Liberal, and that respectability has in the main coincided with permanent political success, and the following result ensues. Whoever wishes to form a forecast as to the fortune of English parties, will consider mainly their relation towards the ordinary moral beliefs of the country. If he sees that, on the whole, average good sense and character inclines to range itself on one side or the other of a political controversy, he will augur that the side favored by character is the side likely to win. Many of your readers may probably not agree with the estimate I should myself form as to the weight in point of character of the two parties into which the English political world is gradually dividing itself. One thing is, I conceive, undoubted. Conservatism, using that word in a very wide sense and independently of strict party divisions, has, within the last two or three years, received in England a great accession of moral strength; and if the reflections I have indulged in are in any degree sound, this fact is one of primary importance.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The thirty-second report of the British Postmaster-General shows a considerable increase in the business of the Post-office Savings Bank during the year. The total amount due to depositors on the 31st of December was $231,334,515, an increase of $14,401,020 over the previous year. In addition to this, the balance of Government stock held by depositors at the close of the year was $11,893,323, making the total sum due to depositors $243,227,837, distributed over 3,535,650 separate accounts.

The number of new savings-bank offices opened during the year was 350, making the total number on the 31st of December 8,106. The greatest number of deposits made in one day was 48,568, and the largest amount deposited in one day was $605,490, which was deposited on the 1st of January. The Government stock investments were 17,133 in number, and the amount of stock purchased was $4,166,393, showing an increase of 5,604 in the number of holders. Eighteen hundred and eighty one provident, friendly, trade, and other societies obtained authority last year to invest their funds in the Post-office Savings Bank, and 200 penny banks also obtained authority to open accounts. A circular of the Education Department was recently issued, drawing the attention of all school boards to the desirability of instituting a penny savings bank at each of the public elementary schools.

A further effort was made last year to induce the hop-pickers who go down to Kent to avail themselves of the Post-office Savings Bank. The scheme, however, failed; for the hop-pickers say they go for pleasure, just as the better classes go to the seaside, and that the money received barely pays their expenses.

A staff of Post-office clerks attended when the workmen employed in constructing the Suakim-Berber Railroad returned home and were paid off. The total sum deposited by these men was $6,053, and, considering the class to which they belonged, it is surprising they deposited so much.

In Canada, the Bahamas, the Cape of Good Hope, Queensland, New Zealand, Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania the Postal Savings Bank is flourishing; while the following statement of such banks in the Continental countries shows their results:

Austria has 428,753 depositors, with a total amount due the depositors of about	$7,000,000
Belgium has 402,836 depositors, with a total amount due the depositors of about	28,000,000
France has 641,323 depositors, with a total amount due the depositors of about	23,000,000
Italy has 1,015,328 depositors, with a total amount due the depositors of about	28,000,000
Holland has 90,798 depositors, with a total amount due the depositors of about	18,000,000

Even in Japan the Post office Savings Bank has been in existence some years.

At the Postal Congress held at Lisbon it was decided, on the proposals of the French Delegate, to convene an International Conference on Post-office Savings Banks, with the idea of forming a Postal Savings Bank Union and devising a scheme of international transactions.

With such illustrations of the long-continued and widespread success of postal savings banks, is it not time for our Government to give its poor the advantages of this system by opening postal savings banks at each money-order office? If the citizens are commended who establish one successful savings bank, what honor shall be awarded our Congressmen who open 20,000 (?) savings banks? The justification for our Government adding this function to its other duties is (it seems to me) as strong as is its justification for carrying the mail; and probably most of the arguments in favor of Government post-offices could be adduced in favor of Government postal savings banks.

I venture the suggestion that the national Government might, while there is a surplus, lend the money thus deposited to the State governments, or buy their bonds, in amounts equal to the deposits made in their respective States. Thus the two-fold allegiance of the depositors would be reinforced, and the number of those pecuniarily and directly interested in the solvency and stability of both their State and the national Governments would be increased. WOLSELEY ON LEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of March 31, Gen. F. A. Walker criticises very severely the recent article of Lord Wolseley on Gen. Lee, published in the March Macmillan. Gen. Wolseley is accused of writing trash unworthy of anybody above a subaltern, and our British cousins are denounced for their ignorance and incapacity in all matters connected with our civil war. Gen. Walker's last words in regard to Wolseley's criticisms are that they are "silly, empty, and vain."

As Lord Wolseley is, and has been for years, the most distinguished officer in the British Army, has conducted with success campaigns in widely separated regions of the globe, and has risen by his talents to the top of his profession among our British cousins, who, though ignorant and incapable in military criticism, are still among the respectable military powers of the world, we were not a little surprised at this savage critique, and have re-read Lord Wolseley's article to see, if possible, wherein consists its offence in the eyes of so distinguished a military historian and critic as Gen. Walker. We have not been able to find any just ground for Gen. Walker's indignant criticism, and that you may see how different things look when viewed from different parallels of latitude, we add the following.

Lord Wolseley's article (which is a review of Gen. Long's recently published 'Memoirs of Lee') gives a sketch of Gen. Lee's personal life and character rather than of his military career, which could not be treated in so brief a space. The English soldier, with graceful and genial pen, portrays Lee's character from boyhood, declares him one of the only two heroes he has ever personally known, and states his deliberate conviction that Lee was not only the greatest soldier of the age, but the most perfect man he had ever met. Now there is nothing new or strange in all this, to one-half of our country at least, for it fully accords with the estimate placed upon Lee by the Southern people. His countrymen have admired, loved, venerated him not so much for his splendid talents as for that high virtue, that finished manhood, which constitute him in their conviction the fitting exponent of their civilization. To them he is the worthy representative and successor of Washington. It is pleasant for them to know that the recognition of his greatness is steadily widening, that impartial observers from the outside are able to descry his true lineaments through the clouds of misfortune and defeat. Lord Wolseley is but expressing in simpler language the opinion long since given by the accomplished English scholar, George Long, who, in his translation of the 'Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius,' after applying to Lee the line speaks of him as "the noble Virginian soldier whose talents and virtues place him by the side of the best and wisest men who sat on the throne of the imperial Cæsars."

Gen. Walker selects two instances to show Lord Wolseley's silliness as a military critic. First, Wolseley speaks of McClellan's army as hopelessly at the mercy of Lee's when the former began its retreat to Harrison's Landing, after the seven days' fighting around Richmond. After some strained criticism about the meaning of Wolseley's words, Gen. Walker goes on in a vein which would indicate that it was Lee and not McClellan that had the worst of it in this famous campaign. He thinks Lee's army "was on several occasions more at the mercy of McClellan than McClellan's army was on any one occasion at his (Lee's) mercy." Now, there are people, above the grade of subalterns, too, that agree with Gen. Walker, but we think they are few and rapidly becoming fewer. There has never been any doubt in the South that the operations referred to resulted in a great defeat to a large and well-appointed army which was ready to close in upon the Confederate capital; there was no doubt at the time in the minds of President Lincoln and his advisers as to the discomfiture of McClellan; and the importance of the victory gained by Lee has been generally recognized by foreign critics. But to come to the exact point, as to the condition of the Federal Army on its retreat from Malvern Hill to Westover (Harrison's Landing), Lord Wolseley is not alone in thinking that if a prompt and vigorous pursuit had been or could have been made, immense damage might have been inflicted upon the retreating forces. Lee himself says of the campaign that, "under ordinary circumstances, the Federal Army should have been destroyed." Stuart believed that if the Confederate infantry had followed him promptly to Westover, McClellan might have been overwhelmed, and Jackson thought that a great opportunity was lost by the delay. Gen. Hooker, one of the bravest and most dashing officers in the Federal Army, says of the retreat from Malvern (to which he was strongly opposed): "It was like the retreat of a whipped army. We retreated like a parcel of sheep—everybody on the road at the same time; and a few shots from the rebels would have panic-stricken the whole command." Gen. Casey says of McClellan's condition July 3: "Had the enemy come down and taken possession of those heights [the Evelington Heights overlooking Westover, where Stuart had placed a gun or two] with a force of 20,000 or 30,000 men, they would, in my opinion, have taken the whole of our army, except that small portion of it that might have got off on the transports." The Committee on the Conduct of the War report that "nothing but a heavy rain, thereby preventing the enemy from bringing up their artillery, saved the army there from destruction." Surely, Lord Wolseley is not "empty" or "silly" because found in such company!

And next about Fredericksburg. We believe Lee and Jackson were right in twice deeming a victorious attack on a Federal army placed on the south bank of the Rappahannock and under the protection of artillery on the Stafford Heights impracticable. But it is only fair to admit that this is a question with two sides to it. There is probably no point in Lee's military career (excepting Gettysburg) that has been more frequently criticised than his failure to attack Burnside on the 14th and 15th of December, 1862. In the South he has been often blamed for it, and foreign critics have frequently spoken of it as a blunder. Gen. Palfrey thinks Lee "probably decided wrongly"; and a British line officer, in one of the best descriptions of this battle we have seen, compares him unfavorably with Hannibal at the Trebia for losing so great an opportunity. The signal and astonishing confession of defeat that Burnside made by his retreat on the night of the 15th at the head of 100,000 fighting men, and his abandonment thus of a campaign but five days old and marked by no full trial of his strength, has, we think, misled many writers into an overestimate of the possibilities of Lee's situation; but he is, to say the least, a bold critic who denounces the judgment of the leader of the English Army as silly and empty for thinking that Burnside might have been crushed.
